A MODERN SCHOOL

FOR THE VIOLIN

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ

AND

JAMES BROWN

SECTION I.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE

SECTION II.—STUDIES
(IN SIX BOOKS).

Section I. deals exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice, and contains a sufficient supply of material for the gradual and steady development of fingering, bowing, intonation, the positions, &c. This Section is issued separately, in six Books, arranged in progressive order, and, incorporated therein (it may be added), will be found all the Scales, Arpeggi, &c., which are needed by Candidates entering for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

Section II. is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in six Books. In point of difficulty the Books are carefully co-ordinated with the similarly numbered Books of Section I., and are intended to be used concurrently with them.

In close connection with "A Modern School for the Violin" it is furthermore intended by the authors to issue an extensive repertory of Pieces suitable for teaching, the majority of them selected from the works of acknowledged Masters, and all calculated to encourage the Student and to further the development of a good style. Each piece will be separate, with pianoforte accompaniment, and the violin parts will be furnished with complete marks for fingering, bowing, and expression.

A HANDBOOK

OF

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists, Member of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, &c.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

Price, cloth, Three Shillings and Sixpence.

THE SONGS

DON GIOVANNI

COMPOSED BY MOZART.

EDITED, WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING,

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With a view to meeting this difficulty a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption or rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

FOR ALL SAINTS' DAY.

IN REMEMBRANCE OF PAST WORSHIPPERS

BY THE

REV. W. H. DRAPER.

A HYMN

USED AT THE CHURCH CONGRESS, 1896, AND SUITABLE FOR DEDICATION FESTIVALS, CHURCH FESTIVALS, &c.

In our day of thanksgiving one psalm let us offer,
For the Saints who before us have found their reward;
When the cords of our love broke asunder we sorrowed,
But now we rejoice that they rest in the Lord.

In the morning of life, and at noon, and at even,
He called them away from our worship below;
But not till His love, at the Font and the Altar,
Had girt them with grace for the way they should go.

These stones that have echoed their praises are holy,
And dear is the ground where their feet have once trod;
Yet here they confessed they were strangers and pilgrims,
And still they were seeking the City of God.

Sing praise, then, for all who here sought and here found Him,
Whose journey is ended, whose perils are past;
They believed in the Light; and its glory is round them,
Where the clouds of earth's sorrow are lifted at last. Amen.

FOR ALL SAINTS' DAY

BY THE

REV. W. H. DRAPER.

A HYMN

(To Tune 423, A. and M.)

Lift up your hearts, Men of toil, Men of war,
Strengthen your feet, for the journey is far,
But, lo! in front at the end of the way,
Gleams from the Citadel greet us to-day.

Lift up your hearts, Brothers! Voices of cheer
Borne on the wind of the Spirit we hear,
It is the sound of the conquerors' strain
Borne from the Mountain to us on the plain.

Lift up your hearts, Men of patience and care;
Pray, for that Song is the end of your prayer;
Search, Men of knowledge, till knowledge is crowned,
You, who are seeking, They call who have found.

Lift up your hearts, Men of sorrows and fears,
Rest after travail comes, joy after tears,
Hark, for They call you whose strife was the same:
"Overcome, Brothers, as we overcame."

Lift up your hearts, ye who fight on alone,
Wounded and weaken'd, but not overthrown;
Lift up your hearts, though you saw, in his pride,
Death strike your dearest ones down at your side.

Death cannot hold them. Their souls are in peace,
Where, in the Hand of God, all troubles cease;
Lift up your hearts then and follow them Home,
Those who have loved us will wait till we come.

Not without us,—so our Father has willed,—
Not without us will their joy be fulfilled;
When at His word they shall climb the last stair,
When they shall see Him, we too shall be there. Amen.

YOUR GENTLE GRACE

AND

COMPOSED BY

I. NORAH MARRIOTT.

Price Two Shillings net each.

"Among modern songs of a superior class we have met with nothing better of late than two compositions by I. Norah Marriott, published by Novello. This young musician, now studying in Paris, proves herself to be not only richly endowed with melody, but with the tact to employ the priceless gift in a thoroughly artistic manner. Her setting of Philip Bourke Marston's 'Remembrance' has refinement of feeling, and there is much original talent in 'Your Gentle Grace,' in which Miss Marriott appears as poet as well as musician."

New Operetta for Schools and Classes.

CINDERELLA

SHAPCOTT WENSLEY

MUSIC BY

GEORGES JACOBI.

THIS new treatment of the well-known story has been specially written and composed, with a view to provide schools and classes with a work simple in construction, free from commonplaces, and interesting alike to performer and auditor.

The lyrics and dialogue, by Shapcott Wensley (author of "The Hours," "The Enchanted Palace," &c.), are crisp, lively, and humorous; the situations allow of ample scope for effective acting and grouping; there are no long speeches, and the stage "properties" needed are readily procured.

The music, by Mr. Jacobi (whose ballet music and other compositions have earned European fame), is VERY SIMPLE, MELODIOUS, and carefully adapted to the capacities of average singers with voices of only moderate range.

Six or seven soloists are required. The choruses are in two parts, the "seconds" never going low. They are all easy to memorise.

The time of performance is just over an hour. The whole work can be effectively performed by twenty young people of either sex, or it can employ the assistance of a hundred.

Staff Notation (with Tonic Sol-fa added), with Pianoforte Accompaniment, 2s.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s. Book of Words, 16s. 8d. per 100.

PREFACE.

Mendelssohn composed his "Six Organ Sonatas" at the request of Messrs. Coventry and Hollier, Music Publishers (then carrying on business at 71, Dean Street, Soho), acting upon the initiative of some English organists who were familiar with his masterly performances on the organ in London and Birmingham. In a letter written to his publishers in London, and dated Frankfort, December 17, 1844, Mendelssohn says (in English): "I hope to send you soon the promised organ pieces. Nine are ready, but I want to have twelve before I make a parcel of them."

The two pieces forming the present publication have been selected from those that remained unpublished of the "parcel" referred to by Mendelssohn. They are now printed for the first time from the original manuscripts preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin.

In preparing these two pieces for publication, expression marks, metronomic rates, and stop registration have been suggested, there being no such directions in the original autographs.

"The Virgil Piano School has just completed a course of four months, in which a number of children have been taught strictly according to the principles of the Virgil School, under the control of a committee of experts. The Virgil Method aims at a complete separation of the technical training from the tuition of the purely musical element, the technical exercises being performed on an extraordinarily ingeniously constructed toneless Clavier. Should this principle at the first moment appear doubtful, all objections are victoriously crushed by the brilliant results which the Virgil Piano School showed in the examination. It was particularly astounding to witness how children, who had not touched a key before, and had only practised on the toneless keyboard for four months, now produced at once an unusually even touch on the sounding pianoforte keyboard."—Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger, June 17, 1898.

"St. Paul."—Wednesbury Choral Society.—"The success of the evening was centred in Mr. Charles Knowles, who, we believe, has never been heard in Wednesbury before, but who created an excellent impression some time ago at Walsall. He comes from Yorkshire and possesses all the manly actions and the vigorous style which characterise the Northerner, whilst his singing on this occasion was of high order, so much so that he aroused his audience from coldness to the highest enthusiasm. In the spirited parts he gave them with fine attack and in grand style, while in the subdued music he was equally successful, and showed that he was not without the spirit of an artist."—Midland Advertiser, May 7, 1898.

Barnsley St. Cecilia Society.—Gounod's "Faust."—"We have not heard Mr. Charles Knowles before last evening, but his admirable rendering of the by no means easy music scored for Valentine, stamped him as a singer of whom Leeds has no need to be ashamed. He sang with confidence, excellent style, was certain of his higher notes, and was by no means devoid of the intensity of passion which is almost inseparable from the part. The death scene was undoubtedly his best effort."—Sheffield Independent.

Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah."—Leeds Choral Union.—"Mr. Charles Knowles sustained a dual rôle in a style to show the rapid progress he has made of late. His singing throughout was to the point and clever."—Leeds Mercury, November 4, 1897.

"Mr. Charles Knowles's assumption of Abimelech and the Aged Hebrew was marked by sterling excellence."—Leeds Express, November 4, 1897.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
OCTOBER 1, 1898.

EDWARD DANNREUTHER.

"How do you mix your colours, Sir Joshua?" once asked an admirer of the great Reynolds. "With brains, sir," was the artist's reply. The analogy will serve in the sister art of music, especially in the region of pianoforte playing. The intellectual pianist, in his aims and aspirations, is as far removed from the mere virtuoso-digitalist as the poles are asunder. The players of the Herz and Thalberg school, by reason of their manipulative dexterity, may excite feelings of wonderment in the listener, but they fail to touch his innermost being. On the other hand, the player who, while being technically well equipped, colours his interpretations—if the simile may be allowed—with the highest emotions of a richly endowed intellect, is the great artist—one whose performances are impregnated with true nobility and soul-stirring fervour. The founder of what may be termed the intellectual school of pianoforte playing was Franz Liszt, the greatest of all great pianists. But although Edward Dannreuther, the subject of this biographical sketch, was not actually a pupil of Liszt's, he has every qualification to be considered a worthy disciple of that illustrious master; moreover, is not Mr. Dannreuther one of the most gifted and highly cultured of modern musicians?

EARLY DAYS.

Edward George Dannreuther, who has been a naturalised Englishman for about thirty years, was born at Strassburg, in Alsace, November 4, 1844. His father, whose people belonged to the neighbourhood of Bayreuth, in Bavaria, spent many years in France and married there. In 1848-49 Dannreuther père got so warmly mixed up in the political disturbances of that time that he thought it prudent to retire. "I have vivid recollections," says our friend, "of a long voyage from Havre to New Orleans in a French brig, on board of which we were the only passengers; of a journey up the Mississippi in a big steamboat, most of the crew and all the waiters being negroes—slaves, I suppose; of a temporary stay at Memphis, in Tennessee; St. Louis, at the junction of the Missouri with the Mississippi; Louisville, at the junction of the Ohio; and finally reaching Cincinnati, where I spent my boyhood." Young Dannreuther was sent to school and learnt music under the late Frederick Louis Ritter (1834-1891), an Alsatian musician and an old Paris friend of his father's, who subsequently became the musical head of Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York. Ritter was a pupil of Kalkbrenner, of his own cousin Kastner, and of Halévy, in Paris. He was proud of having been present at four of Liszt's recitals, and of having heard Chopin on three of the rare occasions when, in his latter days, Chopin played in public.

RITTER ON CHOPIN.

"Ritter," recalls Mr. Dannreuther, "was a rare enthusiast in music, and I may add that he was a very handsome man, being of a Spanish type of the most refined sort. He had certain 'views.' He objected to Meyerbeer, called Herz a humbug, and insisted that twenty Kalkbrenners, twice as many Pixis', Herzs, and Thalbergs would not make a Hummel, or a Field, or a Moscheles! Of Chopin's playing he was wont to speak in glowing terms: 'Never was there, never again will there be a touch such as Chopin's; never such noble cantabile, never such refinement and charm, even when dealing with the greatest difficulties. Chopin lacked physical endurance, but his tone was always sufficient.'" Ritter imbued Dannreuther with a sense for delicate gradations of sound and the subtleties of accent and rhythm. He made his pupil play Mozart, Clementi, Hummel, a little of John Field and Chopin, some Bach

—the Inventions and a few Fugues—a good deal of Mendelssohn and early Beethoven, especially the Sonatas with Violin and Violoncello. "It was all rather perfunctory, and he was perhaps too eager; but, looking back, I cannot say that he allowed me to scamp the work."

"PICKING UP."

About 1850-55 Ritter was busy laying the foundations of a library which, so far as music is concerned, came to be one of the most complete in private hands. "I had the run of his books and music," continues Mr. Dannreuther, "and he took care that I read only what he thought fit. There was also a Londoner in Cincinnati (he is there still, I am glad to know), Mr. Henry Hooper—originally a bank manager, afterwards United States Attorney for the State of Ohio—whom I, little boy as I was, tried to teach the violoncello! Like Ritter, Mr. Hooper allowed me to borrow volumes from his collection of standard English, French, and German authors, and when I had read this or that book, he used to talk matters over. To this day I feel very grateful to him. Thus, gradually, and without being in the least aware of it, I came to be stuffed with many odds and ends of music and book lore; and when I reached Leipzig in 1859, the younger people of the Conservatorium chose to look upon me as a curious sort of enquire-within and pocket-dictionary of things in general—which I was not." Like other successful men who have formed the subjects of this series of biographical sketches, he bears testimony to the advantages of picking up information. So many facilities are now-a-days provided for students, that this habit of "picking up," so diligently practised by persevering young fellows of former generations, is in great danger of being neglected. The advantages of keeping one's eyes open, profiting by one's mistakes, learning something new every day from one's own observation and experience, a self-reliant zeal in everything, and a persistent "pegging away" with an enthusiasm all on fire—the importance of these things cannot be over-estimated as part of the equipment of a successful man's career. In further proof of this he observes: "If you will allow me, I would like to add that my bookish ways have been an advantage in many respects. They have brought me close to Wagner, and have formed the link which connects me with not a few of my best friends in England, of whom I will only mention one—Sir George Grove.

A LETTER FROM WAGNER.

"The following lines from a letter dated Lucerne, March 4, 1872, show Wagner's views in this matter, and are of general interest apart from the allusion to myself:—

My hope, writes Wagner, lies solely in a new generation, for the causes of our latter-day decadence are obvious enough. And with the new generation it must come to pass, as it has come to pass with you personally: namely, music must advance considerably beyond mere "music-making" and include most other things that are significant (Die Musik muss etwas stark über das "Musiziren" hinausgehen, und so ziemlich alles Tiefe in sich fassen). Do not fail to procure an incomparably fine book by my young friend Professor Nietzsche, of Basel—it is entitled The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music (Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik). That sort of thing prompts great expectations for the future, and may, perhaps, meet with the approval of educated Englishmen—with regard to whom, however, I do not quite understand what music is to do for them. But they have their sound classical training, they are stedfast and serious—qualities notoriously absent in Germany now-a-days—unless, indeed, we point to Moltke.

AS A VIOLONCELLIST.

But to return to Cincinnati. Ritter did excellent pioneer work in the West. He started singing classes for seniors and juniors, a choral society and an amateur orchestra. Mendelssohn's Psalms and "St. Paul," the "Seasons" and "The Messiah," Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Beethoven's Mass in C, &c., were duly performed. Young Dannreuther not only played the pianoforte at all sorts of rehearsals, but sang amongst the contraltos, and he frequently had to copy parts. To write out a full-score from the parts, which Ritter occasionally made him do, "for the sake of practice," as he said, was interesting enough; but to "scrawl" duplicate parts made him miserable. Then there was an orchestral society, consisting for the most part of professionals, the nucleus being a Herr Mundt and his family. Old Mundt was formerly a "Stadt-Musikus" at Eisleben, in Thuringia, the birthplace of Martin Luther. He was an excellent contra-bassist and sufficiently acquainted with other orchestral instruments to be a good bandmaster. The Mundts had left Eisleben in 1849, starvation in view, and in Cincinnati all of them were about as hard up as musical beings could be. "Dear old Mundt and his people," says Mr. Dannreuther, "used to play at dancing parties, from which they returned at daylight. About four o'clock in the afternoon Mundt Senior was ready to smoke his pipe and to tune up. Thus, long pipe in mouth, he used to rehearse string quartets with us youngsters—his son, about my own age, was first fiddle, Mundt himself played second, his son-in-law (who became a good engraver of music), viola, and I was the 'cellist. We attempted Pleyel, Gyrowetz, Haydn, and occasionally, as a special treat, a movement or two of Mozart or Beethoven. At Ritter's orchestral concerts I sat amongst the 'cellos—there were five of us, of whom I was the youngest. But once I had a grand chance. The leader of the 'cellos was 'thrunk' and failed to appear, and I was asked to play the solo in the Introduction to Rossini's 'William Tell' Overture, which they said I got through all right!"

CINCINNATI RECOLLECTIONS.

Cincinnati in those days boasted of several good amateur vocalists and flute players, whom young Dannreuther used to accompany. The singers were devoted to Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi; the flautists to Kuhlau, Terschak, and Briccialdi. "I believe," he continues, "that I have heard and played the bass to every note of Kuhlau's flute music—solid and respectable stuff mostly. Finally, Ritter made me rehearse the hymns and sometimes play the organ in his stead at the Unitarian Chapel, where Mr. Moncure D. Conway—now well known in London as a preacher and littérateur—used to hold forth. Mr. Conway's views gradually grew too liberal for the Unitarian Elders, and when the inevitable split came, Ritter stuck to Mr. Conway and I played for the seceders. Then I had a nice little organ of my own, and —— wasn't I happy? But music in Cincinnati was not entirely home-made. We had stars and constellations—Lola Montez, the Fandango dancer of Bavarian fame, who lectured on woman's rights and her own wrongs and sang Spanish ditties; Kossuth, the Hungarian leader, who made political speeches and played a Czardas in private; the sisters Patti, Carlotta and Adelina, who sang 'Dunque io son,' 'Batti, batti,' 'Ah! non giunge' ('no ginger,' as we used to say), and 'Home, sweet home.' Talk of tempi passati: I heard Madame Adelina Patti sing those very tunes at the Albert Hall the other day, and was again charmed as of old. Other people came: Ole Bull, the Norwegian violinist, with Ernst's 'Carneval de Venise' and Miska Hauser's 'Vogel auf'm Baum' (which we admired as 'the Possum up the gum tree'); Vieuxtemps, with his Caprices, and comical perversions of 'Yankee Doodle'; Thalberg, with his 'Don Juan' fantasia, the fine A minor Caprice, and the inevitable 'Home, sweet home.' I was taken to Thalberg's hotel and presented to the handsome grand seigneur dressed in black—six foot two, I thought, but perhaps he was not quite so tall. He permitted me to play his medley 'Lily Dale,' just published, and was very kind. Thalberg advised, amongst other things, the practice of Czerny's '50 Daily Exercises,' which advice I piously followed, day by day, for some weeks—in vain, I fear!" "Such mechanical practice, if prolonged, produced hysteria with me," he adds.

LEIPZIG.

In the autumn of 1859, being then aged fifteen, he went to Leipzig and entered the Conservatorium in 1860 (as No. 853), as a pianoforte student, after having taken a preparatory course of lessons, chiefly on technical details, from Plaidy. At the Conservatorium he was mainly a pupil of Moscheles. At the first lesson Moscheles enquired about the pieces he had already studied. "Very well," he said, "let us go over most of them again. He began with the Mozart Fantasia belonging to the C Minor Sonata and followed it up with the Concertos in A and D minor, ending with the Sonata in F, known as Op. 6, No. 2." "My copy of the last-named," he says, "shows his directions in almost every bar—fingering, phrasing, emphasis, the imitation of parts, light and shade, &c., in minute detail. Clementi's sonatas in D major, D minor, and B minor, together with a large portion of the Gradus, followed. Then Hummel's Fantasia and the A minor Concerto, several of Bach's suites, and sundry preludes and fugues. In playing Bach's three-part Inventions he often made me sing one part, and if I could not do so, I was told to go home and learn it. He also insisted upon transposition. Afterwards his (Moscheles's) own preludes, études (Op. 70, 95, and 111), concertos, &c.; Weber's concertos and sonatas 1, 2, and 3; a little Schumann, less Chopin, and no Thalberg or Liszt! A good deal of Beethoven, of course—the principal concertos and ensemble music, and most of the sonatas up to Op. 90. He did not advise me to attempt the last five sonatas—perhaps he thought that I was not then up to them. Mendelssohn, however, formed the staple of Leipzig pianism. Moscheles took me through all Mendelssohn's pieces, including the works with orchestra. It was whispered that the two old Grands in the pianoforte-room in the Conservatorium were wont to rehearse Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto all alone by themselves, from 12.30 on Sunday night till cockcrow! Force of habit, probably."

GRIEG.

Moscheles's class at that time included a number of students whose names are now well known—e.g., Arthur Sullivan, Franklin Taylor, Edvard Grieg, Rudorff, and the late Walter Bache; amongst the violinists in David's class were Carl Rosa and Wilhelmj. "You ask me about Grieg? He was then a slight-built, retiring youth, of a typical Northern physiognomy, flaxen hair, and large dreamy blue eyes, very quiet, self-absorbed, and industrious. As a pianist he never laid much stress on technique, but his playing was always delicate and intelligent—you know the rare charm he imparts to his own music; and, though he never came forward as a virtuoso, to this day he manages to make a very good show in his magnum opus, the Pianoforte Concerto. To see Grieg, the composer, in a nutshell, examine his 'Norwegische Volksweisen' (Op. 17 and 66). Here are all the elements of his genre, Norse tunes, plaintive or crude, as the people sing and play them—the drone bass—the chromatic inner parts—the use of some quaint bit of the tune by way of introduction or coda—the studied compactness and concentration, the glaring contrasts."

Mr. Dannreuther had the pleasure of introducing his fellow student's music to the English public when he played the A minor Concerto at the Crystal Palace Saturday Concert of April 18, 1874. This was the first appearance of the name of Grieg in a concert-programme of any importance in this country.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

"And Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Dannreuther?" "Sullivan paid little attention to pianoforte playing. He used to sing songs to perfection. I agree with you that his 'Tempest' music is amongst the most beautiful he has ever written—the scoring is delightful. I not only well remember its first performance at Leipzig, but I lent Sullivan my big copy of Shakespeare (published at Philadelphia), from which he wrote the music. In regard to theoretical studies, Hauptmann, whose domain was strict counterpoint, took each pupil separately and set his tasks so as to meet each particular case. He carefully examined my papers and dribbled snuff over them, for which reason I fear his corrections did not always receive respectful attention. The fact is, I usually left the papers in the class-room! I enjoyed playing accompaniments for the pupils of Professor Goetze, the singing-master. He was proud of having sung the part of Lohengrin, under Liszt, at Weimar. He was a curious old gentleman, in a brown wig, who seemed to be discontented with musical matters in general and rather unfortunate in his pupils. David's orchestral class proved a boon. There were no students of wind instruments, and when David wanted to give a preliminary drilling to the stringed-instrument players who were to take part in the Gewandhaus concerts, someone had to play the wind parts on the pianoforte. Sullivan and Rudorff used to do this. When they left, the pleasant task fell to me. David used to give me a few days' notice so that I might procure the scores and be ready in time for the rehearsal, after that I was allowed to keep the scores during the full band rehearsals and at the concerts." It must be admitted that Mr. Dannreuther had exceptional opportunities for "picking up" in his student days, but he made splendid use of them.

"Looking back on those Leipzig days certain events stand forth as vividly in my mind as though they had happened only yesterday. The performances of Bach at the Thomas Kirche—the 'St. Matthew' and 'St. John' Passions, the Magnificat, and 'Singet dem Herrn ein neues Lied'; Beethoven's symphonies at the Gewandhaus; a holiday excursion to Weimar, where, in August, 1861, I heard Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and caught the first glimpse of Wagner; the appearance of Brahms with his D minor Concerto and the Serenade in D (Op. 11); of Joachim, with his Hungarian Concerto and Bach's Chaconne; the rehearsals and the first performance of the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger,' conducted by Wagner (November 1, 1862), before a small audience of outsiders—Wagner's fellow-townsmen held aloof—and so on."

SHADOWS.

But the shadows were not absent. In the second year of his studentship at Leipzig the usual remittances from his home in far away Cincinnati ceased by reason of his father's death and adverse circumstances resulting from the War of Secession. For six weeks Dannreuther lived on bread and apples, not a particularly nourishing diet for a growing lad of sixteen. But Moscheles, with characteristic kindness, was very good to the boy. He procured him some pupils at fivepence per lesson, plus a dinner twice a week, and, in addition, some little stipends belonging to the Conservatorium, one of which originally took the form of "a gift of wood to a musical student in the University." Curiously enough, these little additions to his slender resources have, in a certain biographical notice, been magnified into the statement that he took all the prizes at the Conservatorium, where, as a matter of fact, there were no prizes to take! Read stipends for prizes, and the statement in Grove is correct.

CHORLEY—A TRUE BENEFACTOR.

But the silver lining to the cloud—if not, indeed, the golden opportunity—came in the visit to Leipzig, in the spring of 1863, of Henry Fothergill Chorley. Mr. Dannreuther calls that visit "an extraordinary piece of good luck" for him, as it led to his settling in London. He was made to play to Chorley when the musical critic of the Athenæum inspected the Conservatorium, and again elsewhere on the same day. The next morning he was asked to meet Chorley and Moscheles at Breitkopf and Härtel's pianoforte rooms (the firm then had a pianoforte manufactory of their own). On the table lay the publications of Brahms, consisting of the Sonatas (Op. 1 and 2), Scherzo (Op. 4), Songs (Op. 3 and 7), Variations on a theme by Schumann and Balladen (Op. 9 and 10), and Variations and Fugue on a theme by Handel (Op. 24). Chorley professed to be familiar with everything except the Handel variations, which he asked him to try. The sequel of the incident may best be told in Mr. Dannreuther's own words. "Moscheles said that the piece was a difficult one, and that I ought to look over it first. So whilst they continued talking I turned the leaves slowly. I found the Variations for the most part plain sailing enough, but the final fugue was, indeed, a very hard nut to crack! However, they gave me sufficient time to grasp the main points, and I contrived, somehow or another, to get through. Chorley said to Moscheles, with a grin, that he did not mean to lose his faith in Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses, and then he added—'come to London, and we will see further.'"

LONDON.

Accordingly, about Easter, 1863, Mr. Dannreuther came to London, as Chorley's guest, at his charming little house, 13, Eaton Place West, and stayed there for several weeks. The first thing the kind-hearted critic did was to take his protégé to the tailor's to get him a new coat! Moreover, Chorley introduced him to his friends, took him about right and left, and was "surprisingly kind and helpful." While every acknowledgment should be made of Chorley's exceeding kindness, it must not be forgotten that his young friend's gifts were of a very high order. Talk of the "golden opportunity"—the youth, who had lived on bread and apples for six weeks in Leipzig, made no inconsiderable sum by teaching during the first year of his residence in London.

FIRST PUBLIC APPEARANCE.

Chorley lost no time in giving the public an opportunity of judging of his young friend's remarkable abilities. As in the case of Sir Arthur Sullivan, he used his influence with Mr. Manns who, with his well-known encouragement to clever young musicians, enabled Mr. Dannreuther to make his first public appearance in England at the Crystal Palace Saturday Concert of April 11, 1863. He played Chopin's F minor Concerto (for the first time in its entirety in England), Moscheles's Serenade (Op. 103), and Liszt's transcription of the Valse in Gounod's "Faust." It is not possible to quote the opinion of Mr. J. W. Davison—always interesting and often amusing—on the performances of the new-comer, because The Times, like all the other daily papers, entirely ignored the concert. (Musical critics must have taken matters very easily in those days.) But the good-natured critic of the Athenæum was there—all there; moreover, he spoke with no uncertain sound in regard to the pianist at that concert. Here is the extract from the Athenæum of April 18, 1863:—

Crystal Palace Concerts.—Mr. Dannreuther.—Unless we are mistaken, Saturday last showed a remarkable first appearance in a world where first appearances become, year by year, more and more difficult—the world of pianoforte players. Mr. Dannreuther is a player requiring small consideration on the score of youth; less allowance for inevitable experience; least of all, no silly sympathy such as those melancholy creatures called prodigies easily manage to engage, to the destruction of their future progress. He is simply an artist who enters his profession with an armament of means, powers, and intellectual endowments, regarding the future issue of which there can be no doubt, life and health permitting. His success, from first to last, was remarkable, we repeat. Chopin's first Concerto, the one in F minor, is no piece of pleasantry, but a difficult, dreamy, elaborate composition, in places weak—the beauty of which (and the beauty is great) can only be developed by one who commands rare powers of execution and an innate delicacy of sentiment not to be assumed nor counterfeited—the true musician's sentiment. This difficult Concerto was delivered with so much command of the instrument, so much energy (when energy was wanted) and poetical grace, as not merely to hold fast a large and miscellaneous audience, to whom it was strange, but to assert, to all those who have ears to hear, the arrival of a great new player. A feat much more difficult has not often been accomplished. After this, Mr. Dannreuther played Professor Moscheles's graceful Serenade (Op. 103), a charming, real and sound single movement, and then Dr. Liszt's brilliant transcript of M. Gounod's brilliant and natural Faust Waltz. The themes seize the ear, and the treatment of them is most effective for every purpose of display. Better played the piece could hardly have been, save, perhaps, by Dr. Liszt himself.

A NOVEL "AT HOME."

Mr. Dannreuther must have made a very favourable impression, as he was engaged to play at the Saturday Concert a fortnight later, when he performed Beethoven's G major Concerto. Mr. Manns, writing thirty-five years after these occasions, thus recalls the performances: "His playing was distinguished by a clear, æsthetical, and yet highly animated enunciation of the Melos; his melodies always had speech." He had another good friend in the person of the late Miss Sophy Horsley, who, although she gave him many a long sermon severely anathematising his "Meistersinger" proclivities, enthusiastically championed the cause of the young student from Leipzig. Miss Horsley hit upon the happy idea of a musical At Home of a somewhat novel kind. She invited a number of her musical friends to Broadwood's rooms in Great Pulteney Street. As one visitor after another came in, she, as it were, "turned on" Mr. Dannreuther to play from memory a solo by this or that composer according to the special predilection of this or that guest. This procedure was highly diplomatic and businesslike, as it resulted in getting pupils for the young pianist.

LITERARY DINNERS.

But to return to Chorley. Mr. Dannreuther records some interesting recollections of that distinguished critic and his circle of friends in the following words:—

Chorley's little dinners and musical parties were truly delightful. Of course he knew everybody, but he took good care that whomever he invited was somebody. A wit and a clever talker, Chorley very wisely, as I now think, declined to talk shop—so that musical matters were rarely discussed at his table. Among the habitués were Chief Justice Cockburn, Henry Reeve (the translator of De Tocqueville and editor of the Quarterly Review), Costa, Hallé, Browning, Mr., afterwards Lord Coleridge—a member of whose family was one of my earliest and best pupils—Leighton, and Sullivan, Chorley's prime favourite.

Browning was the only poet I have known who professed to like music as an art. He was familiar with the works of the great masters, and possessed, besides, much quaint out of the way information about music and musicians. I have never seen him touch an instrument or hum a tune. Of song singing and the performance of chamber music, such as he listened to year after year at the Monday Popular Concerts and in private whenever a chance offered, he was a good judge, not only of the performance, but of the merits of the music as well. He was particularly fond of Schumann. With instrumental music of a date later than Schumann he showed little sympathy, and he positively disliked Liszt and Wagner. Was Chorley a good reader of music? Could he read with ease, say, the score of a string quartet? An easy one of Haydn's, yes—a late one of Beethoven's, no. He was in the habit of humming tunes and writing them down, but he used to ask me to add the bass. William Morris was indifferent to music; D. G. Rossetti not exactly indifferent, but he did not care for anything beyond a ditty. Several of Rossetti's songs, however, are distinctly musical in mood and structure, so are some of Morris's—for instance, Rossetti's "Autumn Song," which he wrote out for me and which has been added to his collected works.

I shall never forget a small dinner party of gentlemen, given late in the season by Mr. Coleridge at his house in Southwick Crescent. Browning—whose "Ring and the Book" had been a good deal pulled about and censured for needless repetitions, tough verse, undue length, and so forth—Matthew Arnold, and my little self among the guests (I was to play by-and-bye). It looked as though Mr. Coleridge was trying to bring about a proper friendly feeling between two of his friends. Things went on very smoothly at first. I chanced to sit next to Matthew Arnold, who talked of Croker's edition of Boswell's Johnson, and took no notice of anything that was said across the table. An abridgment of Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe" had been much praised. Someone said that a similar treatment of Richardson's other novels had long been wanted, and would prove a boon. "A boon to whom?" cried Browning, in his abrupt way (his voice was a trifle harsh); "such things should be read entire or not at all. I have read 'Clarissa' twice—every line of it—and I mean to take up the original again; I detest abridgments!" Thereupon Matthew Arnold, in his politest manner—languido, mezza-voce, andantino—observed, "And I could not read the fifth part even of that abridgment without mortal ennui. Richardson's long-drawn method may produce its effect on some readers; to me it is insufferable. Give me 'Tristram Shandy!'"—— Mr. Coleridge and someone else said a few quieting words and the talk turned elsewhere; but Browning remained almost silent till the pianoforte was opened in the drawing-room soon after dinner. He proposed that I should repeat Dussek's Elegy in F sharp minor, on the death of Prince Ferdinand of Prussia, which he had heard me play at Chorley's. "A lugubrious piece, is it not?" drawled Arnold, softly, but very audibly. Some years later Arnold asked me to give lessons to his son "Dick"—and, would you believe it, he expressed a wish that I should choose any music that might be "good for your young pupil, except that dismal effusion of Dussek's"! Mr. Richard Arnold studied some cheerful Schubert instead, and we got on very well together. When the lessons ceased the father sent me a copy of his suppressed poem "The New Sirens," which he was about to reprint in Macmillan's Magazine, together with a nice note. I met him frequently afterwards—once even on literary ground, when an article of his appeared at one end of Macmillan's Magazine and one of mine at the other. "You are keeping good company, Dann.," said Sir George Grove, the editor.

"THE WORKING MEN'S SOCIETY."

Mr. A. J. Hipkins kindly supplies an interesting side-light by the loan of a little memorandum book recording the operations of "The Working Men's Society." The members forming this Society were Karl Klindworth, Edward Dannreuther, Frits Hartvigson, Walter Bache, and Alfred Hipkins, the last-named being a non-performing member, but by no means a disinterested listener. The weekly meetings, held at the houses or lodgings of the members in turn, began on July 27, 1867, and lasted for two years. At these gatherings much of Liszt's pianoforte music, in addition to Chopin, the later sonatas of Beethoven and Schumann, was played by the members, who freely criticised each other, except in the case of Klindworth; he, being so much the senior of the other enthusiasts, was looked upon as the mentor of the party. "Arrangements" were by no means tabooed, as witness the first programme of the Working Men's Society as recorded in Mr. Hipkins's little red book:—

July 27, 1867.

At Klindworth's, 74, Cambridge Street, Pimlico.

K. and D. Beethoven's 9th symphony, for 2 pianos, arranged by Liszt. First three movements.

K. and D. / H. and B. "Fête chez Capulet" (Romeo and Juliet). Berlioz. Arranged for 2 pianos, 8 hands, by Klindworth.

H. Rubinstein's 4th concerto in D minor, accompanied by B.

(Rubinstein played this concerto at Hartvigson's, June 22, 1867.)

 Abbreviations: K. = Klindworth. D. = Dannreuther. H. = Hartvigson. B. = Bache.

But of special interest is the record that, beginning on January 18, 1868, Wagner's "Das Rheingold" was played by Karl Klindworth week by week, except once, when Dannreuther was in Dublin. Later on, March 20, Klindworth treated "Die Walküre" in a similar manner; and in the following year, when Klindworth had gone to Moscow, Dannreuther played through "Tristan." Thus we get this interesting historical fact: that the earliest performances in England of two sections of Wagner's "Ring" took place, without orchestra, vocalists, or scenery, at the residences of Messrs. Klindworth & Co., Limited!

THE FIRST WAGNER CONCERT IN LONDON.

And this naturally leads to the active part the subject of our sketch has played in the Wagner propaganda in this country. He was not only one of the most enthusiastic pioneers in the cause, but he received Wagner in his house as his guest during the visit of the great composer to London in 1877—however, more of this anon. Wagner concerts are common enough nowadays, but twenty-five years ago the man who announced a programme made up entirely of Wagner's compositions ran the risk of being regarded with suspicion, even if he were not looked upon as somewhat of a crank. The first concert of the Wagner Society took place at the Hanover Square Rooms, Wednesday, February 19, 1873, at 8.30 p.m. Here is the programme of the first Wagner Concert given in London :—

Lohengrin	,,
a. Prelude.
b. Lohengrin's Song to Elsa.
c. Bridal Procession.
d. Introduction to Third Act.
Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg	,,
a. Overture.
b. Introduction to Third Act.
Die Walküre—Siegmund's Liebeslied ..	,,
Kaisermarsch	,,

Vocalist—Herr Franz Diener.

Conductor—Mr. Edward Dannreuther.

Mr. Dannreuther also wrote all the analyses in the book of words, which opened with the following quotation from "Much Ado about Nothing" (Act I., sc. 1):

Don Pedro.—Thou wilt be like a lover presently, and tire the hearer with a book of words.

With characteristic thoroughness, he had special extra rehearsals of the strings and wind separately, thus adopting a suggestion made by Wagner and Liszt. The doors of the concert-room were really closed during each piece, and the conductor did not wear gloves—small matters perhaps, but both novelties at that time. It should be observed that the "Meistersinger" Overture, the Introduction to Act III., and the Kaisermarsch were also performed for the first time in England at this concert. Moreover, the members of the orchestra (eighty performers) so completely caught the Wagner fever and the enthusiasm of their conductor (he was tremendously enthusiastic and rhythmic in his beat) that several of them actually returned their fees! Mr. Dannreuther conducted all the "Wagner Nights" of the series of daily orchestral concerts given by Messrs. Novello and Co. at the Royal Albert Hall in 1874. He also conducted, for Wagner, the preliminary rehearsals of the London Wagner Festival in 1877.

WAGNERIANA.

Mr. Dannreuther's recollections of Wagner as a stage manager are very interesting. "I was present," he says, "full score in hand, at all the orchestra and stage rehearsals of the 'Ring' at Bayreuth in 1876. Hans Richter had it all his own way with the orchestra; and it was only during the stage rehearsals that Wagner now and then put in a word, just to keep him, the Capellmeister, in touch with the action. On the stage Wagner was phenomenal. He was director, manager, and maestro di canto in one. He taught everything by direct example. Whatever was wanted he was ready with it, then and there. He used few words—short pithy sentences, like electric sparks. He would quickly sing a phrase, show the proper emphasis and tone of voice, the degree of animation or repose, the correct gesture, or pose, or grouping—and everything of the sort was done with perfect ease and the most extraordinary rapidity as though it was the inspiration of the moment. I can only repeat the word—phenomenal. I am convinced that Wagner's dramatic instincts, his innate sense for stage effect, in short, the actor within him, are the root from which the prodigious stem and branches of his activity as an artist grew up and spread. Poet, playwright, musician, or whatnot, he was essentially the great actor—actor in the fullest and best sense of the word.

"You ask about Wagner's personal ways at Orme Square. I cannot go into domestic details, but I would like to repeat a little of what I have said in Grove :—

Like Beethoven, he at once made the impression of an original and powerful individuality. The fascination of his talk and his ways increased on acquaintance. When roused to speak of something that interested him, he looked what he meant, and his rich voice gave a musical effect to his words. His presence in any circle apparently dwarfed his surroundings. His instinctive irrepressible energy, self-assertion, and incessant productivity went hand in hand with simple kindness, sympathy, and extreme sensitiveness. Children liked to be near him. He had no pronounced manners, in the sense of anything that can be taught or acquired by imitation. Always unconventional, his demeanour showed great refinement. His habits in private life are best described as those of a gentleman. He liked domestic comforts, had an artist's fondness for rich colour, harmonious decoration, out-of-the-way furniture, well-bound books and music, &c.—Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," Vol. IV., p. 365 b.

He felt at home with us, and we found him delightfully kind and fatherly. He spoke German with my wife and often, in a playful sort of way, tried a little Greek. He usually sat up with me for an hour or two in the music-room over a glass of grog, talking at his ease. Callers were not admitted, except by appointment. Professor Herkomer had two morning sittings for the powerful portrait which is now in the German Athenæum Club. George Eliot and G. H. Lewes came to dinner. A party at Sir John Millais' were disappointed, as Wagner at the last moment felt indisposed and unable to leave his room. He went to the Lyceum and warmly praised Irving's 'Richard the Third.' Jefferson's 'Rip van Winkle" charmed him—'perfect in its way,' he said. 'Tannhäuser' at Covent Garden was not exactly perfect. We got there just as the orchestra began the Introduction to the second act.

Digitized by Google

'First rate strings,' he said, 'tone magnificent.' Then came Elisabeth's greeting to the Hall of Song (or rather to the audience and the prompter's box), and the duet with Tannhäuser: 'Oh! the puppets'—he grew restless; at last, when the knights and ladies filed in, quadrille fashion, he fled! 'Let us march too,' he said, and we trotted down Drury Lane to the Strand, where he had discovered a German restaurant. The opera seemed to be entirely forgotten; as if to make up for it, he poured out dozens of comic anecdotes. I had to remind him that the ladies were waiting. 'Very well then, let us get them out of purgatory'—and so we went back and listened to the end of Tannhäuser's pilgrimage.

"He delighted in telling stories. The more grotesque the better. Once after a rehearsal at the Albert Hall, Madame Wagner went to Burne-Jones's studio to sit for her portrait—which unfortunately came to nothing—and I took Wagner to the grill room at the South Kensington Museum. There, over a chop and a pint of Bass's ale, he began to pour out story after story—Judengeschichten this time—stories about German Jews, told in their peculiar jargon. A young foreigner, a painter apparently, had taken his seat at a table opposite, and was quietly watching and listening. Soon, his face began to twitch—I could see that he was making efforts to look serene. But the twitches increased—and, when one of the stories came to the final point, the man fairly choked. He snatched up his hat and vanished. The great event at Orme Square was the reading of 'Parsifal.' During the intervals between the rehearsals and concerts Wagner had been making a fair copy of the poem intended for the King of Bavaria. When the copy was finished, he proposed to read it aloud. Accordingly a small circle of friends, consisting of about twenty people, 'who belong,' as they say in the navy, gathered together in the music room at 8.30 on May 17, 1877. The reading was a wonderful feat. The great actor-poet at his best—an improvisation perfectly balanced—every part stood forth as that of an individual—voice, enunciation, moderation, exquisite — particularly in the second act (Blumenmädchen, Amfortas). One heard the words, and one heard the latent music. Bayreuth in miniature."

HANS VON BÜLOW.

Hans von Bülow was another friend, of whom Mr. Dannreuther says: "Bülow's visits to London acted upon me as a mental stimulant and a source of personal pleasure to boot. His talk was mainly fireworks, but never without some grain of wisdom implied or insinuated. Often when he was in town (between recitals and tours), towards six o'clock in the afternoon, he would play to Bache, or Hartvigson, or myself, the pieces he had been memorising during the day. He practised assiduously for the first, second, or third series of his recitals. (In later years, unfortunately, he chose to practise in public, which the public were quick to resent.) After seven o'clock we used to take a small meal at a Regent Street restaurant, and then visit some place of entertainment for an hour or so. Bülow did not care to enter a theatre—his imperfect knowledge of the language had something to do with that—but the Alhambra, for instance, met his views. Like Wagner, Bülow asserted that a good Ballet can be, and often is, more homogeneous and artistic in effect than an opera. We sometimes went to Hengler's Circus, where Bülow admired the antics of Little Sandy, the clown, whom he pronounced Shakespearean, and a genius in his way.

"One day Bülow paid us a surprise visit at Orme Square. 'Vous êtes marié, Monsieur de Bülow?' said my wife. 'Très peu, Madame,' was the reply. Upon the arrival of Frau von Bülow, some days later, they called together, and he was supremely amiable. Whilst the ladies talked, he declared his views as to the advantages of being 'marié,' or 'non marié,' or 'marié le moins possible.' A jeu d'esprit sur le mariage de Panurge, I thought. It was very amusing and very 'invraisemblable.' Perhaps he improvised it for the occasion!"

Here is a typical Bülow story. When the testimonial fund for Sir Julius Benedict was started, Bülow contributed his mite thus:—

ORME SQUARE MUSICKINGS.

In 1865 Mr. Dannreuther went on a professional tour to the United States with Madame Parepa, Carl Rosa, and Levy, the cornet player. Theodore Thomas conducted a small but very good orchestra. For many years he lived a retired student's life at his former house, 12, Orme Square, Bayswater, where he gave his lessons and made much music. From 1874 to 1893 he gave a remarkable series of semi-public Chamber concerts in the music room of his house, at which the music presented was of a very high order, and it is scarcely necessary to say that it was splendidly performed. During the twenty years that the concerts existed, many important works were performed for the first time in England. Especially was this the case in regard to the chamber music of Sir Hubert Parry, all of which was included in the Orme Square programmes. Other novelties were:—

Brahms's second and third Trios and the Violoncello Sonata, Xaver Scharwenka's Quartet in F (Op. 37), Sgambati's Quintets in F minor (Op. 4) and B flat (Op. 5), Tschaikowsky's Trio à la memoire d'un grand artiste (Op. 50), Rheinberger's Quintet in C and Trio (Op. 12), C. V. Stanford's Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 25) and Trio (Op. 35), and Richard Strauss's Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 13).

Concerted vocal music was by no means neglected. In 1874 a choir was established, called "Mr. Dannreuther's Choir," for the performance of unknown choral works. The following novelties were duly rehearsed :—

Brahms's "Requiem," Marienlieder (Op. 22), Deutsche Volkslieder, Motetten (Op. 29), and Berlioz's "L'enfance du Christ," &c.

AS A PERFORMER.

From the outset of his professional career Mr. Dannreuther has held a foremost position as an advanced pianist—that is to say, he is a performer who unites the equipment of a highly developed technique with a richly endowed intellect. The later sonatas of Beethoven, for instance, are the joy of his heart, and a Brahms or a Tschaïkowsky concerto is to him the ne plus ultra of pianoforte interpretation. In addition to his "enunciation of the Melos" already referred to by Mr. Manns, one cannot help being struck with the rhythmic characteristics of his playing—in short, like unto Sir Joshua Reynolds, he puts into all his work plenty of brains. He has frequently played at the Crystal Palace, Musical Union, Monday Popular Concerts, Philharmonic Society, the Richter Concerts, &c., as well as at the principal provincial centres. At the Oxford University Musical Club, on November 10, 1875, he played Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, when the orchestral accompaniments were played on a second pianoforte by Sir Walter Parratt, then organist of Magdalen College.

One very remarkable feature of his public appearances lies in the number of modern pianoforte concertos he has been the means of introducing to the English public. It may be convenient for reference to give the list in a tabulated form :—

CONCERTO.	DATE.	WHERE PERFORMED.
Chopin in F minor (complete)..	April 11, 1863	Crystal Palace.
Grieg in A minor..	April 18, 1874	"
Liszt in A	Nov. 21, 1874	"
Tschaïkowsky in B flat minor*	Mar. 11, 1876	"
Xaver Scharwenka in B flat minor (Op. 32)	Oct. 27, 1877	"
Hubert Parry in F sharp minor	April 3, 1880	"

LECTURER AND LITTÉRATEUR.

Mr. Dannreuther has by no means confined his artistic abilities to pianoforte playing, conducting, or teaching. As a lecturer on musical subjects he has taken a very high position—the subjects, no less than the intelligent manner in which he has treated them, call for special acknowledgment. Here is an attempt at a complete list of his lectures, given at the Royal Institution, London Institution, Crystal Palace, Edinburgh, Birmingham, and elsewhere, all with musical illustrations admirably performed :—

Mozart and Beethoven (2).
Richard Wagner and the Music of the Future.
Wagner and his Trilogy (4).
Living composers for the pianoforte.
Chopin.
Pianoforte works of Liszt and Chopin.
Musical Form (4).
Robert Schumann.
Beethoven's third style.
History and development of pianoforte music.
Harpsichord and Pianoforte (2).
J. S. Bach's Chamber Music (4).
The Development of Modern Music in connection with the Drama (3).

Three articles which he contributed to Macmillan's Magazine during Sir George Grove's editorship, and an article on Chopin in the American publication "Musical Composers," deserve to be reprinted. Their titles are :

The Opera : its growth and decay (May, 1875).
The Musical Drama (November, 1875).
Beethoven (July, 1876).

He has translated into English three works written by Wagner : "Beethoven," "The Music of the Future," and "On Conducting." As one of Sir George Grove's "young men," it is not surprising to find that Mr. Dannreuther contributed no less than thirty-four articles to the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," of which that on "Wagner" is a very exhaustive, lucid, and masterly piece of biographical work.

"MUSICAL ORNAMENTATION."

By no means the least valuable of his writings is the Primer—Treatise is a more appropriate title—on "Musical Ornamentation" : Part I., from Diruta to J. S. Bach ; Part II., from C. Ph. E. Bach to the present time. This may safely be classed as a monumental work on a very difficult subject, and, as some proof thereof, a recent remark of Professor Klindworth's may here be quoted. He said, "It ought to be translated into German. We have nothing like it in Germany." As a composer our friend cannot be accused of rushing into print. He is exceeding modest in this respect ; but as what he has already published is good, it may be assumed that the manuscripts in his portfolio bear the same characteristic. It may seem strange that so eminent an instrumentalist should only have published songs, but such is the fact. Of these there are three volumes—a set of six songs, by D. G. Rossetti ; a set of five songs, by William Morris ; and five two-part songs, set to lyrics by William Morris, Shakespeare, and Beaumont and Fletcher.

AS A TEACHER.

If all the pupils that Mr. Dannreuther has had during his thirty-five years' experience in London could be gathered together and asked their opinion of him, they would join in a chorus of the highest appreciation of their master's worth. Amongst them have been Miss Lili Mendelssohn (now Mrs. Wach), the composer's younger daughter, and Sir Hubert Parry. A remarkable testimony to his success as a teacher comes from the fact that his pupils have extended to the second, and even unto the third generation. Since Mr. Dannreuther joined the staff of the Royal College of Music, where he is now on the Board of Professors, he has had many professional pupils. But his own remarks on this point may be quoted: "I have given lessons to countless amateurs in London, many fairly good, some admirable. The average is very much higher than it was twenty years ago. But it is only during the last ten years or so that gifted professionals have applied for lessons. The first thoroughly efficient one was my friend Mr. Frederick Dawson. At the Royal College of Music the standard in Franklin Taylor's class, as in mine, is a high one, and, excuse the paradox, we can at any moment set up a young people's show that is well worth hearing."

* Although this was the first performance of the concerto in England with orchestra, Mr. Dannreuther had previously played it, nine days earlier (March 2, 1876), at one of his Orme Square concerts, when the orchestral accompaniments, arranged by the composer, were played on a second pianoforte by Walter Bache.

PERSONALIA.

In 1871 Mr. Dannreuther married Miss Chariclea Anthea Euterpe Ionides, a member of a distinguished Greek family well known in London. Of their five children, the eldest and youngest sons are in the Royal Navy, and the second son is in the War Office.

"By the way, Mr. Dannreuther, can you explain your odd-sounding name?" "The change of D for T and vice versâ occurs in many German dialects. Dann=Tann, a pine tree. Reuth=a clearing in the forest, an uprooting. Compare Bayreuth, recte Bei der Reuth (not Bayrish Reuth): hence 'Tannreuther,' uprooter of pines. The following quid pro quo is exactly as I tell it to you. A young singing damsel at Leipzig asked me, in all innocence (and in German): 'Tell me, Herr Dannhäuser, how do you like Tannreuther?' 'Very much,' I replied. 'Das dich der Deiffel holt,' exclaimed Wagner, in Saxon dialect, when I told him the story in London in 1877—he laughed and laughed again. When he was sciolto, as Beethoven has it, Wagner always talked broad Saxon. He had been explaining the etymology of Bayreuth, as given above, in one of his speeches during the performances of the 'Ring.' In this connection, the same nice little Fräulein, whose singing did not amount to much, said to me in a pensive manner, and again in all sincerity: 'Do you know, Herr Tannhäuser, that if one wishes to succeed with the great public, one must either sing beautifully or else be very pretty. As for me, I sing badly.' But she was sweetly pretty!"

A PUPIL'S APPRECIATION.

An interesting side-light on Mr. Dannreuther as a teacher has been kindly furnished by his distinguished pupil, Mr. Frederick Dawson, who writes as follows:—

"In thinking of my dear friend and master's gifts and learning, I see first his intellectual grasp, his earnestness, enthusiasm, and devotion to his art. The laws he gives are: truthfulness, consistency, and manliness; hence his contempt for all 'crazes' and 'passing fashions,' such as the egotism of the present day, dominating most of the contemporary executive (conductors and instrumentalists—so many sensation-mongers merely) and creative art, much of which spells 'humbug.' He thinks all such is a phase which must quickly pass away, and longs for the return to the thoughtful and honest in interpretation so eloquently and fearlessly preached and practised by Wagner, one of whose few true disciples Dannreuther is. 'Avoid sloppy sensationalism—don't spell your feelings with a "ph"—search for that which will carry conviction with it': these are some of the precepts which he expounds in epigrammatic speech, and his ideas and thoughts are as illuminations, going by deep clean cuts right to the heart of his subject.

"His keen ear for balance of tone, perfect rhythm, and harmonic progressions; his clear perception of Form, with the faculty of imparting his knowledge and adapting himself to his pupil, are a few of the qualities which go to make him one of the great teachers."

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

IV.

On "Supply" Duty.

An aged citizen of Gloucester, whose career as an amateur singer extends over sixty years, assured me the other day that he perfectly recollects the time when, of all the churches in the city, only one, the Cathedral, possessed an organ. The Psalms were sung by the congregation, led by a precentor, just as in the neighbouring chapels, and the tribute of praise was, I gathered, not of a very exalted kind. This state of things may have been due, in a measure, to the character of Gloucester as a puritan city. It was the valiant resistance of the inhabitants which, in 1643, kept Charles I. outside the walls till Lord Essex came to their relief and completed a feat of arms which was the turning-point of the Civil War. Prejudices, especially in religious matters, die slowly, and the spirit of protest, which left, even of the Cathedral instrument, only the case of the choir organ, probably lingered long. However that may be, I can speak positively to the fact that as late as the forties and fifties, organs were rarely seen in the rural districts of the county. More than this, there were, to my certain knowledge, churches which had no music of any kind—churches wherein, if the Lord was ever praised, it was by the hearts of the people, not through their many voices. The reader may ask, with natural surprise, what the clergy were about to permit such a state of things. The answer is that the ministers of the Church in those days were nothing like their successors of the present time. Doubtless there were good men among them, who "wished well to Zion," but did not see their way to break down the wall of tradition that stood between the Church and musically better times. They read the prescribed prayers and lessons, and preached the usual sermons; the music they permitted to take its course, which, when it moved at all, was usually strewn with the débris of quarrels among rival practitioners of the divine and soothing art. A story which I once heard in Devonshire, and received with an assurance of its truth from the teller, records that once upon a time conflict raged between a parish clerk and a nominal choir-leader. Each claimed a right to choose the Psalms and tunes, the clergyman apparently having no voice in the matter. So it came about that on a particular Sunday, when party feeling ran high, the clerk announced from his desk: "Let us sing," &c., "the Hundredth Psalm, 'All people that on earth do dwell.'" Then arose the leader in the front of the gallery, and, carried beyond decency by rage, shouted "D—— 'All people that on earth do dwell,' 'My soul, praise the Lord.'" This is, of course, an exaggerated instance, but I remember occurrences almost as ludicrous in their display of the natural man at spiritual moments. There was once a parish clerk in the village of Olveston, Gloucestershire, who, besides discharging his duties at the desk, played the violoncello in the choir gallery. This was his procedure: At the proper moment he would announce from his place in the "three-decker" the number of the Psalm and the name of the tune. Then would he move out of his official seat, stalk majestically down the aisle, ascend to the gallery, take a reserved place in the centre front, seize his instrument, and proceed to tune it. The tuning was not always speedily done, but it never failed to be done thoroughly, the good old gentleman having no notion of hurry in such a serious business. At the close of the exercise he would return to his first post, with the same impressive deliberation, and so resume his Amens. This ceremony never appeared to the congregation as anything odd. They were used to it, as was the clergyman, who, when not changing surplice for gown, rested quietly in the reading-desk till his subordinate had gone through the customary routine.

One church remaining in my memory as conspicuously destitute in music is that of Oldury-on-Severn. The edifice stands on the summit of a hill, and, in its white-washed days, was an important landmark for pilots and others who navigated the broad river. That seemed about all the use to which it was put, for extremely few persons thought it worth while to climb the hill and listen to the monotonous reading of some "pale, young curate" from the mother church at Thornbury. Usually, no sound of musical voice and instrument broke the dreariness of the service, although a capacious "singing-pew" at the East end of the South aisle showed that musical proceedings had at some time been contemplated, perhaps achieved, till the whole movement died of inanition. When I knew the place the "singing-pew" was always empty, save on certain rare occasions that brought relief to this songless temple. My story of the manner in which musical dew sometimes fell upon the Mount Hermon by the river may interest those who are curious regarding the quaint customs and exceeding freedoms of a state of things now for ever passed away.

I have before spoken of the enthusiastic band of instrumentalists then to be found in Thornbury—a band to which I belonged in the modest capacity of viola player. At that time there lived in the town a basket-maker, Philpot by name. He was a musical maniac on lines of his own, and possessed the largest collection of anthems in manuscript that ever came under my notice. Examples old and new, some, by local composers, of the strangest description, were procured from far and near for the purpose of being copied into his big books. At this task most of his evenings were spent, and nothing delighted him more than to place before sympathetic eyes the voluminous collection of which he was so proud. Philpot, however, was not a collector merely. He delighted to take part in expounding the works he had brought together, doing so with a preference for the tenor solos; which, as owner of the books, he insisted upon singing. The basket-maker was, in point of fact, a genuine follower of a certain Athenian weaver. Even as Bottom desired to play all the parts in "Pyramus and Thisbe," so did Philpot wish to sing all the solos in his anthems. Against this attempted monopoly there were frequent protests, followed by "scenes," but the worthy man held his ground. He deserved indulgence, since he it was who organised the system of musical supply which occasionally bestowed the grace of religious song upon churches like that of Oldbury-on-Severn. Whenever Philpot was seen making calls at musical houses in Thornbury, it was at once understood that arrangements were in progress for an excursion to some outlying and destitute parish. Let me suppose a visit to the church just named, which was within an easy walk and, in summer time, a pleasant walk to boot. Let me further imagine that Philpot, having obtained a sufficient number of acceptances, musters his forces at the time and place fixed upon. Then the little company sets out through the fields in the direction of the white-washed church, which can be seen glinting through the trees on the top of its hill. Each man who is not a singer carries his instrument, and Philpot, bearing his precious manuscript books, stalks on ahead with a swagger that might have made his great prototype envious. Do you ask if the clergyman, or churchwardens, or clerk had been informed that such visitors were to be expected? I reply that nobody dreamed of giving them notice, much less of asking permission. Those officials, in point of fact, were coolly ignored, the assumption being that "supply" could do as it liked, which, indeed, was always the case. The church now comes into full view, and excitement is noticeable among the groups of loungers about the gate. They probably caught sight of the "musickers" some time ago, and gave a cue to the village, which is sending up more than its usual contingent of worshippers. It is a treat to watch Philpot pass the idlers at the gate and move on and into the church. The swagger has become positively imposing. No word speaks he, nor does he turn head or eyes to right or left. He is all dignity and consequence, strengthened by a very comfortable assurance that events will justify the majesty of his bearing when he begins to sing. The clergyman is, perhaps, already in the reading-desk; but he obligingly waits till the visitors have occupied the singing-pew, and tuned their instruments under the round-eyed gaze of as many yokels as can command a view. In a few minutes a piece of paper is handed to the clerk, from which that functionary learns the names of the hymns and anthem which Philpot—who but he?—has selected. Thereupon the service proceeds. I need not follow it.

Nothing is known to me of Oldbury-on-Severn church at the present day, but it can scarcely be rash to assume that the singing-pew has gone, and that choir seats are ranged along the chancel, decani and cantoris all in order; that an organ is boxed up in some chamber which stifles its tone, and that village boys, "clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful," regularly chant Heaven's praises in the vernacular of the Severn Valley, a specimen of which I heard not long since: "Larrd 'ave murrcy upon us, and incline owerr 'arrts to keep this laaw." By help of the two pictures I have drawn you can measure the advance which Church music has made during the last fifty years. Against the wandering band of minstrels tramping through sunlit meadows to pay their surprise visit to a music-less church, put the regular and ordered service of organ and choir, and the whole thing is before you. Nevertheless, I claim that there was something picturesque and even poetical in the earlier procedure; kindly-hearted too, and neighbourly. Philpot and nearly all his followers have long since been dust and ashes, and the at one time favourite funeral hymn of the district was probably sung over the remains of those humble musicians. "Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound," it begins. But you may depend upon it that the lyric was not chosen with sarcastic intent.

FROM MY STUDY.

I dip again into the pages of the Musical Examiner.

There was once in Cheltenham a clergyman of the Church of England named Francis Close. He held the post of vicar (or rector perhaps) of the parish, was renowned for his attachment to "Evangelical" views, and for doughty opposition to the Gloucester Festival, which he held to be anathema maranatha on the ground that it desecrated the Cathedral. Till Lord Palmerston, at the instance of Evangelical Lord Shaftesbury, made Mr. Close Dean of Carlisle, the festival never came round without much beating of the Cheltenham "drum ecclesiastic," and I find a reference to this in connection with the Music Meeting of 1844, as reported in the volume before me. The editor takes note of the fact that the collections were "three pounds and ninepence of the realm" less than in 1841, sincerely hopes that the deficit is not due to "old Close" (pronounce the s as z, please), and then goes for the reverend gentleman's order in J.W.D.'s best fighting style: "It amuses us to think of these fat and sleeky pastors, who are paid handsomely for preaching the Gospel, who live on the oil of the land, who exult in cakes and ale, who walk in attire of velvet, who sleep ten hours of a night, who quaff generous wines, who feed on spicy viands, who attend horse-racings and delight in the sports of the field, who rejoice in skirmishes of boats (!), who shoot their quantity of grouse, who, in short, do this, that or the other, whichever is most agreeable to them—it amuses us, we say, to think of these adipose and luxurious ministers, standing up in the plethora of good eating and drinking, and inveighing in burning words and cunning periods against a charitable institution, merely because it works through the medium of a musical festival. . . . Away with the fat choughs! Ye are pastors, are ye? We'll pastor you, i' faith!" This onslaught, in its breathlessness, almost takes the reader's own breath away, but, of course, the portrait drawn is of the fanciful order. It certainly cannot be called a counterfeit presentment of Francis Close, who was a good and self-denying man, though on some points narrow and mistaken. Nor does the description apply to the thousands of poorly-paid clergy who then covered the land as even now they do. But passion rarely discriminates. In this case, the passion was no mere crackling of thorns under a pot. The fire continued to burn, and blazed up again in a subsequent number of the journal, fanned by protests against the remarks quoted above. "It would appear," said the editor, "that we have spoken irreverently of a reverend person, that we have puffed at a great light, that we have essayed to blow out Mr. Close. To judge from the assertions of our correspondents, we have broached impious doctrines, uttered obnoxious heresies, snarled at the true religion. Having read them attentively, we pronounce them, without a moment's hesitation, chaff." Happily, the clergy, though they may bark, cannot bite. J. W. D. rejoices thereat: "Thank Heaven, there is no Inquisition! Thank Heaven, there are no faith-prescribing councils! Thank Heaven, there is no burning alive!" Then the editor quotes the prelate who at the time was Bishop of London: "A spiritual power without limit, in the hands of men fallible and imperfect, would be perverted (as history gives examples) to the purpose of intolerable tyranny over the inward thoughts and consciences, no less than the outward acts and observances, of all who would be subject to its influences." "What have we said more than that?" triumphantly demands the editor, and, fortified by his Right Honourable and Right Reverend Diocesan, he next turns once more upon Mr. Close: "If reverend gentlemen will so far forget themselves, and abase the dignity of their order, as to propagate rank nonsense from the pulpit in the place of religious instruction they become notorious public nuisances, and can no longer expect the veneration due to that calling which they do not honour and that surplice which they do not adorn." This was the last shot fired—for the time.

It must not be supposed that objectors to musical festivals in cathedrals—the Dean of Gloucester styles them "cranks"—are even now altogether extinct. The Gloucester Citizen has lately contained a good many letters—some of them illogical, the rest silly—addressed to the music meeting recently held. They answered the purpose of amusement and served to vindicate faddism as a great British institution. That, as far as I can discern, was about all.

Our advanced and progressive musicians, who sneer genially at the "Bohemian Girl," when they are not snarling at "Elijah," may be interested to know that the editor of the Musical Examiner, at whom they cast retrospective jibes on occasion, came down with crushing intent, if not demolishing effect, upon Balfe's opera. He said: "We heard the 'Bohemian Girl' last season, on the night of its first representation, and found it exceeding poor in melody, exceeding unlearned in harmony, and exceeding scraggy in orchestration. . . . This opera, we mentally exclaimed, as we yawned our way home—this opera can never survive ten nights. It is a weak imitation of Monpou, Grisar, and others of the Parisian composastinasters, with a dash of the Riccis, the Coppalas, the Verdis, and other Italian composastinasters. The melodies, when tolerable, are not Balfe's, and when Balfe's are not tolerable." In time (and not a long time) the hundredth performance took place; the editor being present to "verify or dissolve" his earlier impressions. He verified them. Hear him: "We lost not a word of the intolerably absurd dialogue; we missed not a note of the alarmingly insipid music. . . . At the piece we laughed; at the music we felt an irresistible inclination to blubber outright. And is this, sighed we, the melody of 'Young England'? Is this our 'Coningsby' set to music? Is Balfe to be the centre of a new millennium for us? Alas and alas! to what a pass have we arrived! Surely no man will call this music?" Later on, the editor modified his opinion re the "Bohemian Girl" very largely, being less firm than when the late Dr. Hueffer, the late Mr. Walter Bache, and, if I am not mistaken, the late Von Bülow, with a few others who are still living, invited him to dinner and sought to win him over to Wagnerism. They failed, notwithstanding the extreme politeness and tact with which they assured the old and wary journalist that a man whom he had chosen as his most intimate associate and fellow-worker was "a fool."

The Musical Examiner received Hector Berlioz doubtfully, but with a desire to give him fair play. In after time, the eminent critic and the "curious composer," as J. W. D. styled him, became great friends; but of this there was little hope when, in 1843, the former wrote: "To judge from these (certain of his early works) we should rather be inclined to class him as a daring lunatic than a sound, healthy musician. Their sole merit lies in the great command of orchestral effect which they certainly display to an eminent degree. In melody they are particularly deficient—so much so, indeed, that we feel inclined to believe M. Berlioz utterly incapable of producing a complete phrase of any kind. When, on rare occasions, some glimpse of a tune makes its appearance, it is cut off at the edges and twisted about in so unusual and unnatural a fashion as to give one the idea of a mangled and mutilated body, rather than a thing of fair proportions. Moreover, the little tune that seems to exist in M. Berlioz is of so decidedly vulgar a character as to exclude the possibility of our supposing him possessed of a shadow of feeling. . . . To be ugly and original at the same time is very possible, as M. Berlioz plainly shows, but the kind of originality which depends on ugliness can claim no consideration from a rightly thinking mind, for the plain and simple reasons that, firstly, anyone can effect it that chooses to condescend to it, and, secondly, it is in every sense reprehensible when effected. To produce disagreeable sensations can never be the province of music, the loveliest of the arts, and, as yet, we can see no reason to premise anything else of the effect of M. Berlioz's harmonic and contrapuntal qualifications." This reads as no less conclusive than severe, but the editor kept his judgment open to correction. Said he: "It seems absurd to imagine that the worship of a world of artists, of by no means ordinary calibre, can be altogether founded on smoke. That M. Berlioz receives this worship is undeniable. The great critic, Dr. Robert Schumann, declares him the finest orchestral composer in the world. . . . One thing is certain: if Berlioz be not a great man, he is, at least, a conscientious artist, which, nowadays, is no small merit. . . . His notion of high art may be erroneous, it is true, but nevertheless he sticks to it, as a polypus to a rock, with unshaken obstinacy, and by this he wins our sympathies. We confess that our expectations of his powers are anything but favourable, but we shall be the foremost to acknowledge all of good in him that we, by any possibility, can get a glimpse of." This correct attitude was naturally followed by appreciation and a life-long friendship between the French master and "ce bon Davison."

In 1843 the Philharmonic Society advertised a concert at which only one symphony was to be performed, instead of two. Our editor almost went into hysterics over this change: "Alas, alas, we could weep tears of blood to think of the past, and ponder on the future—the bright, bright past; the blank, blank future. O Beethoven, slumbering giant, will not thy mighty spirit be disturbed in its repose, and start from its sepulchre to frown on the authors of this desecration? Great shadow, arise—arise from thy sleep, and lift thy finger in scorn and derision at the pigmies who would blaspheme against thy majesty. . . . O music, music, thou art irretrievably lost unto the sons and daughters of Albion, if once this blotch on propriety becomes a habit! Artists, rouse yourselves. Smash it, smash it, trample upon it, spit upon it, deface it, defile it, extinguish it utterly, let it not breathe a breath to-morrow, or music will henceforth be a memory, a mockery alone." How beautiful are the passions of youth, and how pathetic in their lack of proportion! X.

It is not always the provincial "boy," unless, indeed, that much-maligned young gentleman of the printing office is now and then in the habit of changing places with his metropolitan comrade-in-case, in order to get a change of—type. In one of the great London Dailies during the past month the name of "S. W. Slay" was given as the composer of "In exitu Israel." Could this have reference to a setting of the familiar Psalm by a new composer—one who might very well be numbered with the slain, even though he were not dead? No: the "boy" ought really to have known better. There is only one "In exitu Israel" and that is not by S. W. Slay, but by S. Wesley, who, during his lifetime, was classed with the slain, or rather he was put "down among the dead men" by a biographical dictionary, but not by a newspaper. Another great Daily, also published in London, recorded that "Mozart's Griminov Symphony" was performed at the Gloucester Musical Festival. The title of the work is new to us and even Otto Jahn does not seem to mention it. As the news came from a "special correspondent," the "boy" might attribute its creation to an eccentricity on the part of the telegraph; or a surfeit of Russian music may have jocosely prompted him to invent the grim, or the "Griminov" designation. Another instance occurred in the columns of a weekly religious paper, not altogether unknown in Fleet Street. In this case—the upper, or the lower case according to the reader's, or the printer's choice—the christian name of the new conductor of the Carl (or Carr) Rosa Opera Company was thus femininised: "Mr. Hannah MacCunn." But after all, is there not some excuse for the poor "boy"? The recent great heat wave has doubtless exercised upon him a peculiarly strange spell.

In reference to an "Occasional Note" which appeared in our August number (p. 525) on the subject of the "Bible Christian Sunday School Hymnal," the editor, Mr. J. R. Griffiths, writes:

"Lux Benigna" is in "Psalms and Hymns, 1867," compiled by G. F. Chambers and revised by R. Redhead. It is to be found on p. 350, but under the name "S. Oswald." As this book was a re-issue, it is just possible that the tune also appeared in a previous edition. "Psalms and Hymns for Public Worship" is another book altogether.

As Mr. Griffiths gave only half the title of an obscure book, there was some justification for taking his reference to be an abbreviated designation of the well-known hymnal "Psalms and Hymns for Divine Worship," issued by Messrs. Nisbet and Co. in 1867, and for which Dr. Dykes wrote six tunes. It is quite true that "Lux Benigna," under the name of "S. Oswald," is to be found (in the key of G, by the way) in "Psalms and Hymns for the Church, School, and Home"—to give it its full title—edited by the Rev. D. T. Barry, and published by Messrs. F. Warne and Co.; but there is no direct evidence to show that the tune first appeared therein. But this book does not seem to have been published with music anterior to 1867; moreover, as stated on the title-page, the tunes are those of the "Parish Tune Book," edited by G. F. Chambers. As "Lux Benigna" does not appear in the first edition of Chambers's book (1865), the inference that "it is just possible the tune also appeared in a previous edition" of Mr. Barry's book will not hold good. In the Rev. J. T. Fowler's "Life and Letters of John Bacchus Dykes" (1897), the following extract, from Dr. Dykes's diary, is given: "August 29 [1865]. Leeds.—Began writing out a tune for 'Lead, kindly Light.'" But no information is supplied by the biographer as to when and where it first appeared in print.

The Annual Report—or Return, to use the official designation—of the British Museum is a very interesting document, even though it appears in the form of a Parliamentary Blue Book, and is published at the modest and odd price of 8½d. The first item of real musical interest is the information that "4,922 pieces of music, each complete in itself, have been acquired by copyright during the year." What becomes of this large output of (in round figures) 5,000 compositions? How many of them are still-born? How many are really works of genius? And how many are worthless? Leaving these modern questions to be answered according to each reader's individual fancy, we may pass on to refer to an ancient acquisition, thus described in the Return:

The most important Liturgy purchased is a vellum copy of the Hieronymite Missal printed by Georgius Coci at Zaragoza in 1511, a most beautiful book, considered by the printer himself as one of the first instances of music printing in Spain. Only three other copies are known.

The additions under the heading of Music, in the Department of Printed Books, are by no means unimportant. They are thus enumerated:—

The collection of music has been enriched by the acquisition of 236 part-books of Motets and Madrigals, printed in Italy in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, many of which are of great rarity. Among them may be mentioned a set of five Tenor Part-Books of Masses and Motets, probably printed at Venice by Andreas Antiquus about 1520; nine sets of part-books by Grammatio Metallo; the "Magnificat" of Simon Boyleau (Milan, 1566), Motets by P. Zallamella (Venice, 1582), Gemignano Capilupi (Venice, 1603), Francesco Colombini (Venice, 1626), and Guglielmo Lipparini (Venice, 1629). A most important purchase has been made of a unique copy of the "Recerchari, Motetti, Canzoni, Composti per Marcantonio di Bologna," printed by Bernardino of Vercelli at Venice in 1523, a work which is not only the earliest published collection of compositions for the Virginal, but is also the earliest instrumental music printed in modern notation. Another valuable acquisition is the beautifully engraved "Libro della Chitarra Spagnola," by the Academico Caliginoso, a composer whose identity has not been ascertained.

Here is an opportunity for someone to distinguish himself by discovering the identity of this unknown gentleman. The question might be asked in some Examination Paper. But to return to the Return. These additions reflect great credit upon the skilful administrative abilities of Mr. W. Barclay Squire, who has charge of the printed music at the British Museum.

In the Manuscript department the additions include a letter from Mrs. Browning to H. F. Chorley, and an "Autograph journal by Charles Burney, Mus. Doc., of a tour in Italy and France in 1770, forming the basis of his Present State of Music in France and Italy, 1771." Also the following music in manuscript:—

Motets and songs by Flemish composers; circ. 1530-1540. Vellum. Presented by Herbert Thompson, Esq.

Bass part to Palestrina's "Offertoria" for five voices, published in 1593.

Arias from operas, in score, by Baldassare Galuppi; 18th century. Presented by R. A. Streatfeild, Esq.

Scena in the autograph of Sir H. R. Bishop, 1807; and lute music by J. Dowland, in modern score. Presented by A. Hughes-Hughes, Esq.

"The Brides of Venice": an autograph opera in full score by Joseph F. Duggan; 19th century. Two volumes. Presented by Mrs. Julia St. George.

The portraits of musicians acquired during the year are as follows:—

Beethoven, Ludwig von (sic). 1. In his sixteenth year; a silhouette. 2. Walking; a reproduction of a pen drawing. 3. After L. Letronne, by B. Höfel, stipple. All presented by Mr. Justin.

Novello, Clara, after F. Salabert, by W. Sharp, lithograph.

Thus we have sampled this learned and exhaustive Blue Book, which runs to 161 pages, in regard to its musical interest. "You have the pull of the whole world at the British Museum," once remarked an Irish musician to the present writer. He was not very far wrong.

Mr. F. G. Edwards is writing the biographies of Samuel Wesley and Samuel Sebastian Wesley for the "Dictionary of National Biography." He will be very glad to receive any fresh information relating to these two distinguished English musicians. Any letters, or other documents, that may be kindly lent for this purpose will be carefully preserved and duly returned. Communications may be addressed to 1, Berners Street, W.

Liszt accompanying a comic song? Can it be true? Yes, perfectly true; and the incident furnishes an interesting contribution to the history of musical storms. In the autumn of 1840 Liszt, in company with other artists, went on a provincial concert-tour in this our native land. The funny man of the party was John Parry, inimitable as a singer and composer of comic songs, though they were always of a refined type and free from vulgarity. At each concert John Parry sang his ditty entitled "The Inchcape Bell," in which he had the honour of being accompanied by Franz Liszt. In order to heighten the effect of Parry's song, and give it local colour, or, in the case of a storm, water-colour, the great pianist was wont to introduce, by way of interlude, "an extemporaneous storm, which had a most terrific effect." Parry, in the meantime, evidently sheltered behind his copy, would wait until the storm had passed over before he proceeded upon his vocal way. In such manner did Liszt give rein to his lighter, or lightning fancy. Moreover, we may assume that on the part of the audience the storm was hailed with enthusiasm, and that it was naturally attended with thunderous applause. One thing, however, is absolutely certain: as the storm came between the verses, it must have cleared the air.

A curious example of how biography is sometimes made in the daily press is furnished by the obituary notice of the late William Chatterton Dix, the well-known hymn-writer, whose death, we regret to record, took place at Cheddar, Somersetshire, on the 9th ult., at the age of sixty-one. The notice in question states: "Most people are familiar with Mr. Dix's hymn commencing 'As with gladness men of old,' sung so frequently during Epiphany to Kocher's tune, which he named 'Dix,' in compliment to the composer of the Hymn." This statement, that Dr. Conrad Kocher (1786-1872), the composer of the tune, named its English version "Dix," is highly improbable. In its original form the tune first appeared in Kocher's "Stimmen aus dem Reiche Gottes," issued in 1838, when Mr. Dix was one year old. In Kocher's book it is associated with the words "Treuer Heiland! wir sind hier." The tune, as we know it, seems to have been first used in "Hymns Ancient and Modern" (1861). Its adaptation to Mr. Dix's familiar hymn, as well as its name, "Dix," is probably the work of the Editor of that popular publication. The hymn and tune have since worthily found their way into many hymnals. The refreshing brightness of those gladdening words—the outcome of a mind possessing poetical "gifts most rare"—no less than the melody with which they are invariably associated, has gained for this devotional lyric a hold upon the affections of Christian people worthy of the theme which it so beautifully expresses.

Some Continental musical journals have been at considerable pains in representing the late Prince Bismarck as having been an ardent and even enthusiastic lover of the divine art, although their case would hardly appear to be made out altogether satisfactorily by the numerous obiter dicta quoted. The following remarks on the subject, made by the Iron Chancellor in conversation with a well-known member of the Reichstag, and communicated by the latter to a German paper, furnish a curious matter-of-fact commentary to the idealistic endeavours referred to. "Although," said the Man of Blood and Iron, inter alia, "I was given some lessons on the pianoforte in my youth, I reaped no benefit therefrom, since I took no interest whatever in the matter. The fact is, I have no ear for music and lack the sense for its proper appreciation. I enjoy, however (this, probably, with a grim smile), listening to an Italian barrel-organ, and I have a partiality, too, for the harmonica, if it is well played. At the Opera or the Singakademie I have but rarely been, and then from official considerations rather than personal inclination." There is a genuine ring about these utterances ascribed to the great Chancellor, however disappointing they may prove in some quarters. Still, there always remain the harmonica and the barrel-organ to fall back upon!

Mr. Frederic H. Cowen will form the subject of the Biographical Sketch in our next number. A new portrait of this much esteemed musician, specially taken for The Musical Times, will, as usual, form one of the Supplements.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Reference is made in another column to the late Rev. F. Close and his attacks upon the Festival of the Three Choirs. That doughty warrior has gone, but there are men who seek to wield his weapon, and "write to the papers," if they cannot preach from the pulpit. One such is mildly insinuating. He thus addresses the editor of the Gloucester Citizen: "Will you kindly allow me to ask, through your columns, if some Latin scholar will be good enough to interpret the meaning of the words 'Lauda alla Virgine,' which, I understand, formed a portion of a 'religious service' offered in our Cathedral very recently?" This writer is hardly the dullard he pretends to be, but it appears not to have occurred to him that men, irrespective of creed, may fitly praise and honour her to whom an angel said, "Blessed art thou among women," and who was chosen in the councils of heaven to be the mother of our Lord.

The Dean of Gloucester, at a recent meeting of festival stewards, applied the term "cranks" to such objectors as the foregoing, and appears greatly to have offended one of them, who discharges some sort of duty in connection with the Diocesan Mission. The mental calibre and personal refinement of this gentleman may be gauged by one or two short extracts from his letter. In the first place, he perpetrates a sorry joke: "The Dean has answered my question, and distinctly says that the 'Festival' is 'a great religious service,' and that the people go there to learn to pay—I beg pardon, I mean pray." Exquisite, indeed! Claiming that every service in the Church of England must be free and open to all, our objector goes on: "If the Dean and Chapter allow a 'service' which involves great expense, that is their look out; we do not ask them to hire a lot of 'Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Hereticks' to sing for us, or to teach us to pray." These quotations will suffice, for already the reader may be preparing to unite a pastille.

Mr. Kensit seems to have inspired one objector to terribly imitative of himself. This "crank," if I hear be true, presented himself at the [illegible]ral door and demanded free admission to the [illegible]ce." He made no attempt to enforce his [illegible], and, having protested, went peaceably away. I give the whole story, because what remains [illegible]me as apocryphal.

[illegible]Spence uttered no uncertain sound on the [illegible] dispute between the Gloucester "faddists" [illegible]upporters of the triennial gathering. Stating that in his opinion the festival observances were acts of worship tending to promote and deepen devotion, the very rev. gentleman declared that as long as he remained Dean, the festival would be welcome within the walls of the Cathedral. After this the individual who discharges some duty in connection with the Diocesan Mission may be inclined to labour in a more congenial atmosphere.

Signor Mancinelli, in an article which appeared lately in the Æolian Quarterly, disclaims the assertion that, in the writing of his "Ero e Leandro," he has been influenced by Wagner. He says that in the composition of the music he determined to follow the lines of Verdi, more especially in his operas "Otello" and "Falstaff," and is under the impression that his countrymen will advance art by following in those footsteps.

The following question comes to me in the pages of the New York Concert-Goer. I pass it on to the Wagner Society, whom it chiefly concerns:—

What would be thought of a concerto for violin or 'cello that allotted the solo instrument mere incidental snatches intended to throw into greater relief the wonders of the orchestral score accompanying them? How much more then should we hold in abhorrence the being who would drag down the human voice, most delicate, most expressive, most divine of all musical messengers, to the uttering of raucous shrieks (vide Mime, Alberich, Fafner) or even of mere declamation such as Wagner puts upon the vocal cords of nearly all his musico-dramatic personages?

I find some curious remarks in a Manchester Daily anent the recent great success of "Elijah" at Gloucester. The critic observes: "The reasons of its (the oratorio's) immense popularity in England are perhaps not hard to understand." I should say that there is no "perhaps" in the case. He continues: "It is full of pleasing melody (really!), it is Scriptural in subject, and it is utterly without reticence or deeper significance." As to lacking reticence, Mendelssohn generally spoke the fulness of his heart and brain. He could do no other. As to deeper significance—deeper than what? Again our critic: "Much of 'Elijah' is certainly attractive if not heard too frequently, and it would not be necessary to use disparaging words about it if a great majority of the public would only leave it in its proper place and not seek to establish its composer on the same pedestal with the greatest masters of the divine art." Here be strange ethics, i' faith! Critics must abuse "Elijah," not for its faults—which are faults under any circumstances—but because there is danger of the public placing it and its composer higher than they, the said critics, think is deserved! Once more: "Mendelssohn was always in prosperous circumstances, and he was unable to enter into or appreciate the deeper emotions of human life." The construction of this sentence seems to imply that his inability was a consequence of his prosperity. We all know, on high authority, that a rich man can hardly enter the Kingdom of Heaven, and now we have it, certainly not on the same authority, that he cannot feel the deeper emotions of life! As a matter of fact, though naturally bright and happy, Mendelssohn was a man of exquisitely keen feeling, and could share the sorrows of humanity as well as its joys. Moreover, he could express them in his music. It is the old story. Mendelssohn had not the so-and-so of So-and-so, or the something-else of the other man. Meanwhile, the public love his music and pay to hear it. This is very sad, of course, but has to be endured.

Writing some battle impressions in Scribner, James Creelman says :—

In every battle that I go through, I somehow get a melody in my head and hum it to the end of the action. I suppose it is the result of nervous excitement. A man's nerves play him some very curious tricks. All through the battle and massacre of Port Arthur in the Japanese war, I hummed the air from Mendelssohn's Springtime, and during the shell fire I found myself actually shrieking it. When I started in the charge on Fort Caney, I began to hum "Rock of Ages," and I couldn't get rid of the tune even when I was lying among the dying of Chaffee's brigade in the hospital camp. I remember that when General Chaffee leaned over me after I had been shot and asked me how I was, I couldn't answer him until I had finished, in my mind, one phrase of "Rock of Ages."

It would be interesting to know if others have had like experience. If so, we may regard the fact as further evidence that melody is the final expression of humanity in its moments of most intense excitement.

A WAGNER NOVELTY.

Every musician knows, or should know, that the Prelude to Act III. of "Tannhäuser," called "Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage," as played in the opera and at concerts, is not identical with that originally composed. But few have ever seen, much less heard, the latter. None of my friends and acquaintances, though they include well-known authorities on matters Wagnerian, know the original, longer, version of this impressive specimen of Wagner's art; and as there may be many amongst the readers of The Musical Times who are similarly situated, it may prove interesting to describe the differences between the first and second versions of the Prelude.

The comparison has been almost as fascinating to me as that of Beethoven's "Leonora" Overtures, Nos. 1, 2, and 3. To be sure, Wagner was satisfied with only a very small amount of re-writing, and in this respect no comparison can be made with Beethoven's three overtures. But by the application of his blue pencil he reduced a movement of 155 bars to one of 92 bars without much further trouble, though most likely with many heart-pangs and much grumbling at a perverse, cruel fate, and a philistine, unappreciative world. But the cancelled portions included so much matter dealing in the most powerful manner with the terrible climax to "Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage"—viz., the curse pronounced upon him by the Pope—an event scarcely hinted at in the later version, that we are justified in looking upon the composer's first conception of the Prelude as an entirely different piece and a much more faithful epitome of "Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage."

I believe it is a fact that Wagner did not make the change because he was displeased with the music quâ music, but because he feared that his audience might fail to appreciate the significance of certain passages relating to events which are only referred to subsequently—i.e., in the course of Tannhäuser's narrative. Perhaps another reason was that he did not think it wise to tax his hearer's patience by introducing an orchestral piece of 155 bars, in slow time throughout (Andante assai lento, crotchet = 56), so late in the course of the opera. Now that every Wagnerian knows his "Tannhäuser" by heart and cannot have enough of his favourite master, however "slow," there should be no reason why the original version of this Prelude should not be produced and prove a most interesting addition to the répertoire of orchestral concerts. It seems to me a much more impressive and suggestive piece than the shortened version, and, moreover, it will be one of the very few remaining Wagner "novelties" that we are ever likely to hear!

Assuming that Novello's edition of the vocal score is known to most of my readers, all references to pages hereafter must be understood to apply to that edition. The two versions are identical up to bar 40 (page 221 of Novello's edition), where, after the last note, E flat, of the descending passage in octaves, the original version introduces for the first time the prayerful phrase associated with "A Song Divine," that promised "hope of pardon" to all (pages 244-5) :—

Notice the continuation of the theme upwards, which strongly recalls the similar continuation upwards of the Grail theme (Dresden Amen) in the "Parsifal" Prelude. After the last bar of the above quotation we have the sequence of shakes which play such an important part in Tannhäuser's narrative (page 244-5-6)— after four bars of which we suddenly plunge into a powerful passage of four bars commencing—

Another bar of shakes, but on a lower degree of the scale, and we arrive at the "Song Divine"— which is repeated two octaves lower and followed by its alternate strain as on page 245, second line, also repeated two octaves lower and throughout pp. Four more bars of shakes and, after a bar of syncopated chords (più f), we arrive at the "Song Divine" in E flat, played ff by the brass, as in bars 46-49, of the present version (page 221, line 5). So that in place of the four bars occupying the third and fourth lines of page 221, the original version contained 36 bars! The next 10 bars (51-60) are virtually identical in the two versions, but now we enter upon the most remarkable point in the original version. Instead of the demisemiquaver string passage (bars 61 to 64, page 222), we have for 7 bars a return to the mournful, contrite figure accompanying the first part of Tannhäuser's narrative and occupying also the 13th and subsequent bars of the Prelude. Then the composer has a surprise in store for us. The passionate phrase recalling the "Wonn' und Lust" of the Venusberg—is twice heard, to suggest, no doubt—a subtle, human touch—that, in spite of Tannhäuser's contrition and pilgrimage, his thoughts wander momentarily back to his "Frau Venus." A passage of six bars, not to be found in the present version, leads into the terrible Curse theme, thus :—

thundered out ff by the brass and repeated several times on different degrees of the scale, thus leading by a short unison passage to a climax identical with bars 2-5 on page 248 of Novello's edition. This is the tremendous climax of Tannhäuser's narrative, as well as of this Prelude, and it seems to me that it is vastly more impressive than that of the present version. One bar's pause, a few quaver pizzicato chords, and with the "Song Divine" high up in the fiddles, we return to the point whence the two versions remain identical to the quiet, peaceful end.

Who will perform this valuable and highly interesting "novelty" by the great master for the first time in London? Will not Mr. Henry J. Wood endeavour to trace the full score and orchestral parts and complete arrangements for a speedy production of the "Prelude to Act III., 'Tannhäuser' (Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage), First Version"? A. ARTURO TOSCANINI.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR AT LA SCALA.

(From a Special Correspondent).

The most important event of the musical season in Italy—commencing, as usual, on St. Stephen's Day—this year will be the re-opening of the Teatro della Scala, which, one may say, had been closed after centuries of glorious activity and of splendid traditions. As a matter of fact, no other theatre in Italy, and but few in other parts of Europe, can at all compare with the great Milan establishment, which furnishes the keynote in matters operatic. Some time since a committee was formed by some of the most highly esteemed and influential persons of Milan in order to provide the necessary funds for the resumption, upon a substantial basis, of these celebrated performances; and it is no secret that Verdi himself—albeit desiring that his name should not appear in the matter—consented to become the illustrious guide and counsellor of this body of gentlemen. In these circumstances, to be placed at the head of the artistic direction of the Teatro della Scala would seem, unquestionably, one of the greatest possible honours for any musician to attain; and it is upon Signor Arturo Toscanini that the choice of the committee has fallen. Nor should the singular and gratifying fact be here left unstated that everyone, not even excepting former chief conductors of the theatre, or those who had entertained some hopes of themselves being chosen to fill the coveted position, heartily approves of the appointment and acknowledges the superior merit of its recipient.

Signor Toscanini is only thirty years of age, having been born at Parma, on March 24, 1868; but he has reflected more profoundly upon all matters connected with his art than many another musician twenty years his senior. He is, in fact, a born conductor. Thoughtful, precise, somewhat frigid in appearance, self-possessed in all circumstances, he grasps the general spirit and masters the details of an art-work at a glance, unfolding it before his hearers with admirable clearness and plastic delineation. Toscanini was not an infant prodigy. When entering the musical academy of his native town (which has now become a Royal Conservatoire) he was not considered remarkably clever. He joined the class for violoncello playing for no other reason than that there was no vacancy for him elsewhere, and although gaining some prizes, as well as the encouraging approval of his teacher, Signor Leandro Carini, it was the study of theory and harmony which more especially attracted him. To these latter subjects, in which Signori Pio Ferrari and Dacci were his instructors, he devoted himself diligently, but with a certain independence of spirit, which frequently led him to considerably strain the measure of freedom extended by Horace to poets and artists. The originality of his gifts, combined with the seriousness of his character, soon enabled him to exercise considerable influence over his fellow pupils, with whom, at the age of thirteen, he formed a small orchestra of their own, himself being chosen its conductor. Every kind of music was performed, after a fashion, by this little band, and if it led to no other tangible result, it at least helped to stimulate and mature the artistic temperament of the young musician who was at its head.

Having left the Academy, Toscanini obtained engagements as violoncellist in various orchestras, both in Italy and elsewhere, and in the course of his wanderings he also went to Buenos Ayres, where he joined the orchestra of an Italian opera company, under the direction of Signor Ciacchi. The affairs of the troupe were not over-brilliant at the time, and, above all, a competent orchestral conductor was badly wanted. For some time past the subscribers had insisted upon a change being made, and the matter came to a climax during the performance of "Aïda," when the audience assumed such a threatening attitude towards the obnoxious chef d'orchestre that he had to beat a precipitate retreat. The question arose, where to find a substitute at a moment's notice, and with the audience in such a disturbed condition? It was in this emergency that the members of the band requested Toscanini to place himself at their head, greatly to his own surprise and that of the public. The result was a complete triumph for the young musician, who, at the conclusion of the performance, was almost overwhelmed with the plaudits of the audience and the congratulations of his colleagues.

This incident decided the future career of the young artist. Returning to his native Italy, he once more became a rank and file member of the orchestra, and in that capacity he played at the memorable first performance of "Falstaff" at Milan; but his talent as a conductor had been too conclusively proved for him to be allowed to remain much longer in a subordinate position. As a matter of fact, he was appointed, a few months later, to the conductorship of the Teatro Regio, of Turin, and subsequently obtained similar important appointments in other parts of Italy. It was under his direction that the remarkably fine first performance of "Götterdämmerung" took place at Turin, while he also conducted the première of Puccini's "La Bohème," the Donizetti festival at Bergamo (in which Joachim, Teresina Tua, Piatti, and Madame Melba took part), as well as the grand national concerts in connection with the recent Turin Exhibition.

Toscanini's memory is perfectly marvellous. Once he has mastered the details of any score, however complicated, it becomes engraved upon the "tablets of his brain" for ever. Thus, after a first rehearsal, he invariably conducts without the score, and with an exactitude and ease truly remarkable. An admirable stylist, conscientious in the handling of the minutest detail, there is nothing which escapes his solicitude and attention, with the result that his interpretations, both in the concert-room and the theatre, are, by common consent, absolutely masterly. With the true objectivity of the artist, he sees but the embodiment of the beautiful in his art, which with him amounts to a cult. Truly, if there is anyone capable of reviving the ancient glories of the Milanese Theatre, that one is Arturo Toscanini, and lively indeed is the satisfaction I experience in communicating these confident anticipations to an English public, which has shown itself at all times so benevolently disposed towards our national lyric stage.

SOME LEEDS NOVELTIES.

Three of the new works to be produced at the approaching Leeds Festival are at the present moment available for a brief descriptive note.

Sir Arthur Sullivan being unable to fulfil his promise of a choral composition, the committee requested Mr. F. H. Cowen to fill the void and did not ask in vain. Mr. Cowen wields the pen of a ready writer; the question was, therefore, not so much the providing of music as of securing a libretto in a hurry. Time did not allow the making of a new "book," and Mr. Cowen selected from among available poems Collins's "Ode to the Passions"—a masterpiece which former composers had turned to account without by any means exhausting its possibilities. In his treatment of the Ode, Mr. Cowen adopts the continuous method, but his sections are well marked though the music does not actually cease. Those who know Collins's piece—and who does not?—are aware that it offers a fine opportunity for descriptive or suggestive music, as the personified Passions successively essay the "instruments of sound." This is the one commanding and determining feature of the poem, regarded as "words for music," and the composer has, in the present case, taken full advantage of it. So much was to be expected. A bright fancy, with large capacity for varied and imaginative expression, never deserts Mr. Cowen, and here we have it in unusually full force. This is evident on the face of the copy before me, where every chance of pictorial effect is turned to account and we seem to witness the varied results of an appeal from primitive humanity to the most human as it is the most divine of the arts. I shall not have the pleasure of hearing the work at Leeds, and therefore refrain from criticism which there will be no opportunity of correcting. At the same time, I fully expect to hear of a distinguished success gained by the "Ode to the Passions" and its eminent composer.

The novelty provided by Dr. Alan Gray is called "A Song of Redemption," and has for text the well-known sacred lyric beginning "The foe behind, the deep before," the reference being of course to the passage of the Red Sea by the host of Israel. Dr. Gray has laid out his setting for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra with special care for the chorus—a preference as wise as it is obvious in the case of one who writes for Leeds. The composer shows no less shrewdness in the character of his choral sections, throughout which solidity and strength prevail, with opportunities for broad effects and stimulating climaxes. These characteristics imply simplicity of structure, to which the composer adheres even in his solos. The piece, though brief, may be depended upon to produce a great effect in the hands of the Leeds singers and players, and, afterwards, not in theirs alone.

Larger in dimension than either of the foregoing is Mr. Edward Elgar's "Caractacus." The composer, who has a liking for subjects far removed in point of time, found a literary colleague in Mr. H. A. Acworth, C.I.E., by whom the information which history and tradition give us as to the famous British king is combined with some efforts of his own imagination. The result seems to me a clear and interesting plot, giving ample opportunities for musical characterisation and descriptive effects. Mr. Acworth, or, more likely, the composer himself, lays the scene first in and around the British camp, crowning what is now called the Herefordshire Beacon, and, next, in Imperial Rome. The heroine, Eigen, is a daughter of Caractacus, betrothed to Orbin. These lovers are warned by a Druidess that the King should not meet the Roman army outside his stronghold, and they convey the caution to the monarch. Moreover, it is found, at a solemn Druid gathering, that the omens are against success. This conclusion the Arch-druid misrepresents to the King, despite the protest of Orbin, who belongs to the semi-sacred order of minstrels, and in that capacity is present. The Druids expel Orbin, who, when the King marches against the enemy, joins his forces. The warnings are soon justified. Caractacus is beaten by the invincible legions, and soon after falls, with Orbin, into the hands of his foes. The scene in Rome is history. Claudius at first inclines to put the King, Eigen, and Orbin to death, but the noble bearing of the British chief prevails against this, and honourable captivity closes his heroic career. Here is a stirring and exalted story, which the composer has treated much on the plan of "King Olaf," with the same dramatic force and vividness of colour. There is much to expect from the work, because, as a glance even at the pianoforte score shows, much has been put into it. So greatly, however, does a composition of this kind depend upon the orchestra that judgment apart from the full score, or a hearing, cannot be a safe guide. I express my own opinion when I say that "Caractacus" will worthily follow "King Olaf."

CHURCH MUSIC.

As the recurring "Three Choirs" meetings invariably bring to the fore some notable specimens of festival church music, it was to be expected that at the recent Gloucester performances some service music of the kind would be heard to advantage and with impressive effect; and those who hoped to hear important new church music of the largest form were not disappointed upon this occasion. Mr. Lee Williams's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis and Mr. A. H. Brewer's Psalm "O sing unto the Lord a new song" were both written for the festival, and appropriately formed important features of the opening service held on Sunday, the 11th ult.

At a musical service recently held in St. David's Cathedral, an effective Te Deum Laudamus in D, by Cyril W. Bowdler, was sung, and the organ solos included an Andantino by the organist, Mr. Herbert C. Morris, and a Festal March in E flat, by Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, the Gloucester Organist.

Signs are evident both at home and abroad of increased interest not only in the use of plain-song, but in the art of playing organ accompaniments to the ancient music of the Church. This art has long been studied by the French ecclesiastical musicians; now it is being recognised more and more in England, in Germany and other Continental countries, and in America. Although plain-song themes may be elaborately treated in the composition of great choral and even instrumental works, the canons of the art of its accompaniment rightly moderate the employment of abstruse and chromatic harmonies and the use of such organ tone as reed work, mixtures, and the more powerful and fanciful combinations and resources of the "king of instruments." The old chancel organ, though often insufficient, gives the right quiet, sombre tone for plain-song accompaniment, with its unassertive smooth-toned "flue" work of chiefly eight feet range, duly balanced by a small number of "registers" of sixteen and four feet, with nothing beyond perhaps one stop of two feet compass. Seeing how many students now master the ancient modes, and the increasing number of works dealing with the subject, it is not difficult to understand the development now under reference.

Already in country districts and in many provincial centres the harvest festival, an institution the Anglican Church has done so much to foster (if the joyous celebration was not indeed created by that great branch of the Church militant), is now being observed. In London and in some of the greater cities the joyous occasion follows a little later on. The harvest festival is essentially a musical opportunity, and this condition of affairs has been largely brought about by the happily extensive store of special music prepared for this picturesque service. For the production of sacred art of all kinds there is, in the Scriptures, an unbounded wealth of references, comparisons, narratives, and beautiful pastoral poems dealing with sowing, reaping, and harvest time, which have for ages inspired poets, painters, and musicians by their pictures of nature and their vivid exposition of religious truth.

Very satisfactory is it to note that the subject of sacred music would, in the hands of strong and able exponents, occupy the attention of those assembled to take part in the Church Congress at Bradford. It has not been the rule, but the exception, to consider this great and popular topic at the Church Congress meetings; but it is not too much to hope that no such assemblies will be drawn together in the future without that burning question—the position and development of sacred art in connection with public worship—meeting with adequate consideration.

A Church contemporary has been suffering from a by no means novel kind of nervousness—a fit of alarm with regard to the development and elaboration of Church music. In this connection the oratorio in Church appears to be a special source of disquietude. Surely there is something of a narrow spirit in complaints of this type. We hear no corresponding expression with regard to the revival and development of Church architecture; but this form of sacred art does not call for the continued presence in Church of living exponents with constantly existing claims upon public interest, so comes less into contact with the human side of clerical life than does the work of the Church musician; therefore a free development may be allowed to ecclesiastical architecture. Again, the welcome advancement of learning and oratorical powers of the preacher are not attacked by these same writers, who find it necessary, only too obviously in the clerical interest, to protest against the equally legitimate development of musical eloquence. It is certainly much too late to object to the daily more and more complete return of the oratorio to its original and true home, the Church.

Pleasant it is to turn from this distressing display of narrowness to the contemplation of such a healthy sign of the times as the proposal to form a large Church choral organisation in the North-west district of London, under the guidance of a number of right-minded clergymen, who have not failed to appreciate the value of sacred music in connection with the work of the Church.

On the 19th ult., at Christ Church, Scarborough, Garrett's Harvest Cantata was sung by the choir, under the direction of Dr. Thos. Ely, organist of the church.

ORGAN MUSIC.

The performance of Professor E. Prout's Organ Concerto in E minor at the recent Gloucester Festival was a matter of interest, as displaying the still too rare combination, in this form, of the orchestra and organ in a great church under every circumstance to advantage. As time goes on additions will no doubt be made to the list of instrumental works of the concerto type for organ and orchestra—the latter in its full modern amplitude; works which, in addition to Professor Prout's, already include concertos by M. Guilmant, Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, Mr. Henry Gadsby, Dr. Sawyer, and an organ concerto, which is deservedly well known, by Rheinberger, scored with parts for strings and three horns. Indeed, a sufficient number of such compositions is even now in existence, and duly recognised as of artistic merit, to cause some little surprise in various musical circles that such works are not heard more frequently upon great musical occasions.

At Wellington, New Zealand, on July 28, Mr. Maughan Barnett gave a recital, including music by Smart, Boellmann, Dubois, and himself. At the Collegiate Church, Holyhead, Mr. C. H. Moody played recently, among other pieces: Rhapsodie, Salomé; Postlude in E flat, Wély; and Air with Variations, Hird. Mr. Walton's recitals at the Cathedral, Glasgow, appear to be duly appreciated. He rightly assigns a conspicuous place to Bach's organ music in his schemes. Recently he gave a good performance of the brilliant and stately Toccata in F, showing skill therein in his effective "registration." An Adagio by Guilmant and Rheinberger's Sonata (No. 11) were features of the same programme. This recital was the last of a series.

During the course of the past month Mr. J. M. Preston gave an interesting series of recitals in St. George's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The pieces played included Gigout's "Rhapsodie sur des Airs Catalans"; Pastorale, W. Dawson; Adagio and Allegro, Hans Huber; and Marche Solennelle, Tombelle. In connection with the choir festival at Thirsk Parish Church, on the 4th ult., Mr. T. H. Fall played a selection, including a Prelude and Fugue by Bach and Andante Cantabile by Widor.

At Chagford Church, on the 7th ult., Mr. Vinnicombe gave a recital, his programme including two movements from Lemmens's "Sonata Pontificale," Guilmant's Allegretto in F sharp minor, and a Festival March of his own. During the past month recitals have been given at St. David's Cathedral by Mr. W. M. Brooke, whose programme included A. Hesse's too little played Fantasia in E, Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C sharp minor, and a Pastorale in D flat, by Mr. MacMaster; Mr. W. H. Harris, whose scheme included an Allegretto in F sharp minor, composed by himself; and Mr. H. C. Morris, who gave a Guilmant programme on the 20th ult., including that master's fine Sonata (No. 1)—which ought to be more frequently heard in its symphonic form with organ and orchestra—the Finale in E flat, and several other movements; and Mr. Morris also played the last recital of the series on the 27th ult., with a miscellaneous selection, in which Mendelssohn's Fourth Sonata and the fine March in B flat by Silas commenced and terminated the performance. Mr. J. Pullein, of St. Swithin's, Lincoln, recently gave a performance at the Parish Church, Wrexham, his pieces including Rheinberger's Sonata in F minor (No. 7) and Berceuse and Abendlied by B. Jackson.

Another fine concert-room organ has been added to the long list of such instruments to be found both in the United Kingdom and in the United States. This is the organ built by Messrs. Abbott and Smith, of Leeds, to commemorate the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria, in the Town Hall, Ryde, Isle of Wight, and which was ably opened by Mr. E. H. Lemare. The specification is that of a good, useful, workable three-manual organ. It is satisfactory to note in the scheme the presence of a goodly and varied array of eight-feet registers; and there is an ample number of the mechanical appliances so useful in any organ, but specially so in an instrument built for concert-room purposes. Several of the choir organ stops, including the orchestral oboe, clarinet, and Glockenspiel of three ranks, are placed in a swell-box. Seeing that Mr. E. H. Lemare and other authorities speak highly of the instrument, it is clear the people of Ryde are to be congratulated upon their new possession. The action is tubular pneumatic.

Mr. Fountain Meen gave an inaugural recital on the occasion of the opening of the renovated organ in Maze Pond Chapel, Old Kent Road, on the 8th ult., with his usual success. The work, in which the pipes of the old organ are incorporated, has been carried out by Mr. E. O. Yorston, of Vauxhall Walk, under the direction of the organist, Mr. W. Dexter Miller.

Mr. E. H. Lemare will resume his Saturday afternoon organ recitals at St. Margaret's, Westminster, at 5.30 to-day, and Mr. W. Alcock will resume his Saturday organ recitals, at 4 p.m., at Holy Trinity, Sloane Street, in November.

THE COMING SEASON.

The Autumnal musical season, now already upon us, has been heralded as usual by the Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall, under the enterprising management of Mr. Robert Newman. The reconstructed orchestra, directed by the conspicuous ability of Mr. Henry J. Wood, has given renewed indications of its excellence. Notice of these concerts will be found in another column. An extremely busy and interesting season is again in prospect.

The Royal Albert Hall.

The committee of the Royal Choral Society announces a series of eight concerts, seven being included in the subscription, with an extra performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday. The series will open on November 10 with "Elijah," when the chief soloists will be Miss Ella Russell, Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli, Messrs. Lloyd and Santley. The programmes of the season will also include Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" (December 8), "The Messiah" (January 2), "Israel in Egypt" (January 26), Gounod's "Redemption" (on Ash Wednesday), a Wagner Concert, including the "Holy Supper of the Apostles" and a selection from "Parsifal" and "Tannhäuser" (on March 9), when it is hoped the first-named work will at last obtain a hearing in London. The season will conclude with Mr. Elgar's new work "Caractacus" (written for the Leeds Festival) and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," which was revived so successfully last season.

Queen's Hall.

Mr. Newman announces the resumption of his excellent Saturday Symphony Concerts on the 29th inst., and they will be continued on November 12, 26, December 10, January 28, February 11, 25, and March 11. Mr. Newman has also secured the services of M. Lamoureux to direct three afternoon concerts on November 2, 16, and 30; and, looking far ahead into the spring, we may also mention the London Musical Festival, which is to take place from May 8 to 13, as already stated in these columns, when M. Lamoureux's Parisian Orchestra will play alternately with the Queen's Hall Orchestra. It may also here be recorded that the Sunday Afternoon Concerts were resumed on the 18th ult., and that a series of Sunday Evening Concerts (principally oratorios) was commenced on the same date by Mr. Newman with the aid of the Queen's Hall Choral Society and Orchestra. With the exception of the Lamoureux series, all these concerts are placed under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood. The autumn series of three Richter Concerts, under the management of Mr. Vert, will commence on the 17th inst. The London Ballad Concerts at this hall will commence on November 5 and terminate on April 15, and a Scotch Ballad Concert will be given on St. Andrew's Day. The Philharmonic Society's concerts will take place on March 8, 22, April 19, May 4, 18, June 1, 15.

The programmes will include the following symphonies: Beethoven's "Eroica," Dvorák's "From the New World," Schubert's No. 9, Schumann's "Rhenish," Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic," Raff's "Leonore"; and the novelties to be produced are: "Triumphal Procession" March, from the Leeds cantata "Caractacus" (Edward Elgar), Fantasia for organ and trumpet (C. Couldery), Grand Festival March (Charles Maclean), Idyll (Marshall Hall), English Fantasia on March Themes (Edward German), a new Symphonic Poem (Dvorák). A special Paderewski concert will be given on December 10, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" will be performed on the 27th inst., and Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" on November 10.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society announces four concerts, commencing November 29 with Mr. Elgar's Leeds cantata "Caractacus." The other concerts will include Cowen's "Ode to the Passions," Beethoven's Second Symphony, Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto, &c. (solo, Mr. G. H. Betjemann), the "Golden Legend," and concert-recitals of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci."

The Finsbury Choral Association announces the following works for performance during the coming season: Mr. F. Cunningham Woods' male-voice cantata "A Greyport Legend" (for the first time in London), Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Wagner's "Lohengrin" (Act III.), and a "Stanford Evening," when the Cambridge Professor of Music will conduct his "Revenge" and "Requiem." This attractive programme is sure to be efficiently carried out by the able conductor of the Society, Mr. F. Cunningham Woods.

The People's Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. C. H. Allen Gill, announces five concerts, comprising "Elijah," "Creation," "Messiah," Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," Elgar's "King Olaf," and the final concert will include either Mendelssohn's "Athalie," Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal," or a concert-recital of Gounod's "Faust."

The Bow and Bromley Choir, under Dr. McNaught, is engaged to give a series of concerts at the People's Palace. "Judas," "Creation," "Elijah," and the "Golden Legend" are among the works announced.

The South London Choral Association and the Institute Orchestral Society will perform the following works during the season: November 23, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri"; February, Costa's "Eli"; April, J. GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

September 11 brought with it the opening of the 175th meeting of the Three Choirs—the fifty-eighth at Gloucester. A solemn and imposing opening it was; contrasting most favourably with the usage theretofore observed. Instead of an ordinary service and sermon on Tuesday morning, we had, after the fashion at Worcester, a great Evensong, at which soloists, orchestra, and chorus assisted; at which three new works were produced, and at which there was a congregation estimated at 6,000 strong. I do not guarantee the numbers, but I know that the interior of the Cathedral was a wonderful sight. Every part of it was crowded, even the ambulatory in rear of the altar. There were some who were glad to occupy a seat in the Lady Chapel and enjoy whatever of the service could there reach their ears. But the charity of the vast gathering hardly proportioned itself to the eagerness with which admission was sought. The 6,000 dropped £57 odd into plates—that is to say, twopence and a fraction per head! Let me mention two facts on the other side. It does not appear that any buttons were contributed; while the £57 odd exceeded the collections taken at both the opening and the closing services in 1895. That, at least, is a sign of advance in the quality without which all else is sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. The three new works may be spoken of as successful, each in its way. Dr. Harford Lloyd's "Festival Overture" hardly ranks, perhaps, as a strong piece, and there is in it little of the conventionally festive, as expressed by the pomp and circumstance of sound. I take this to be a result of the restraint invited by a work destined for use in a religious service. The slow introduction is quite tender in feeling, and not less beautiful in effect, while in the Allegro many passages show the earnest endeavour of a capable man to be impressive and even exciting without stepping over the bounds of propriety as we understand that term in church. Mr. Lee Williams's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis made a very great impression, the last-named more especially, in which there is a bass solo so purely beautiful, so exquisitely simple and touching, that the whole congregation was subdued by it. Many other sections of the two works made a kindred effect in their degree, and thus the singular power of pathos which the composer exercises (as in his "Bethany" and "Gethsemane") was again triumphantly asserted. The setting of Psalm xcviii. by the conductor, Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, proved to be a much-revised version of his recent exercise for the Dublin Mus. Bac. There is much in it frankly to admire, and not a little indicative of power to do even better in the future. The orchestration, varied and appropriate, is much more than mere accompaniment; the vocal melodies are free from mere commonplace, and the contrapuntal sections satisfy those who expect much from one trained to church music from his youth. Each composer conducted his own work, and the performance was generally excellent in character. An impressive rendering of the rich and beautiful orchestral "Meditation" in Mr. Elgar's "Lux Christi" brought the musical proceedings to an affecting end. The Dean's sermon, in which he had much to say concerning the decay of architecture and the growth of music, has been disputed on certain points with some sharpness. There is no need to enter upon the discussion here. In the main, the Dean was right, if in some details he was wrong.

Monday having been devoted to rehearsals that involved a great deal of hard work, the series of performances constituting the festival proper began on Tuesday morning with "Elijah"; the principal solos of that perennial work being in the accustomed hands of Madame Albani, Miss Ravogli, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Watkin Mills. In this case a simple record of fact suffices, and I shall merely add that the execution of the oratorio gave satisfaction; not only the principal vocalists, but also the chorus and orchestra earning praise under the baton of Mr. Brewer, whose début, looked forward to with hope, was witnessed with unstinted admiration. There was a large attendance, over 3,100 persons having secured seats. The evening programme comprised Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Part I. of the "Creation." Both works are familiar to the public frequenting these festivals, and once more it was shown how much our English amateurs love to hear again that which they already know. The solos on this occasion were in the hands of Madame Ella Russell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. David Bispham, and Mr. Sunman. Like Miss Ravogli in the morning of the same day, Madame Russell made her début in Gloucester Cathedral, and, as was to be expected, achieved a marked success by the beauty of her voice and the skill of her vocalisation. Of the other artists, Mr. Hirwen Jones and Mr. Sunman, if I mistake not, made a first appearance. All did well, and the ensemble could hardly have been better. It seemed that every one engaged took delight in the beautiful works of Haydn and Dvorák—works so wide apart in period and character yet so equal in the finest qualities of music.

Wednesday morning brought with it a miscellaneous selection, the features of which I will touch upon in order. First came Dr. Prout's Organ Concerto in E minor—the Opus 5 of that learned and industrious musician. It is a fine work of a kind to which few additions are now made, and it was nobly played by Mr. G. R. Sinclair, of Hereford Cathedral, who brought out its effects with fully adequate execution and unfailing taste. Nor was the orchestra wanting in justice to its share of the common task, a share, by the way, containing not a little which must be pleasant to perform. Samuel Wesley's "In exitu Israel" obtains an occasional hearing at these festivals, in recognition of its great qualities as an example of church music. It stood second in Wednesday's programme, and gave the Gloucestershire chorus a splendid opportunity. They did not throw the chance away. There was a drop in the pitch, but not great enough to deprive the rendering of the high character accorded to it by one and all. The chorus sang with infinite spirit, the noble bass voices more especially coming grandly out. But there was little to choose among the sections of this chorus in the performance of a work than which few of its kind are more stimulating or better adapted to kindle enthusiasm. Next followed the three new sacred pieces of Verdi, which were heard for the first time in Paris last Easter. The "Stabat Mater," "Hymn to the Virgin," and Te Deum were discussed in these columns shortly following the French performance, and I am not called upon to go over the same ground after so short an interval. Gloucester had the honour of first introducing the three works to an English audience, and accomplished the task—a very difficult one, by the way—in a manner with which the composer himself might have been well satisfied. Especially should honours be given to Madame Ella Russell, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Jessie King, and Miss Hilda Wilson, who so successfully contended with the Hymn for voices alone. These ladies accomplished no ordinary task after only a few rehearsals, and placed themselves, in my opinion, absolutely on equal terms with the Parisian artists, who had probably given much more time to preparation. The beauty of the quartet as thus interpreted made a deep impression, while the two choral and orchestral pieces, with their vivid effects and glowing tone colours, their bold progressions and impassioned phrases, went to the hearts of all who listened. The effect was profound—as deep as the solemn stillness which reigned everywhere among the audience. Following this, the variations of Brahms upon Haydn's chorale "St. Antonie" seem to be regarded as an anti-climax, and received by no means the full attention which is always their due. The "Hymn of Praise," solos by Madame Ella Russell, Miss Nicholls, and Mr. Ben Davies, ended the selection, and gave the pleasure it never fails to impart. Madame Russell and Mr. Ben Davies were superb; the one in "Praise thou the Lord," the other in the great scena which is one of Mendelssohn's happiest afterthoughts. Mr. Brewer again won golden opinions by the steadiness and clearness of his beat, and by the calm confidence with which he faced all the exigencies which arose in the course of the music.

Wednesday evening's concert took place in the Shire Hall, where it alone represented the secular side, once so conspicuous at the festival. The room was full, and the audience, debarred from applause during the rest of the week, expressed their appreciation of what was done in a very forcible manner, despite the almost disabling heat. Sullivan's "Golden Legend," the chief feature in the programme, was preceded by the Overture to "Die Meistersinger," Miss Ellicott's choral ballad "Henry of Navarre," and a new Orchestral Ballade in A minor, specially written by the young Anglo-African, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor. The Bishop of Gloucester's daughter has produced many better things than "Henry of Navarre," which misses the heroic mark at which it aims. Obviously the fire of Macaulay's verses is not shared by the music, and, after all, who can wonder at it? Such a theme needs to be handled by a strong man, not by a woman, whose imagination can hardly conceive the scene at Ivry—the exultation and despair, the delirium of the fight and the triumph. It was unfortunate that Miss Ellicott could not find time to complete the new work she had undertaken to write. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's piece met with extraordinary success, and assuredly it is stimulating, highly coloured, and sonorous even for the present generation of hearers. It has barbaric moments, moreover, and is by no means unworthy of a youth who follows Tschaïkowsky. Mr. Taylor will tone down in course of time. He is at the stage of crude feeling now; presently will come the tempering influence of judgment. The composer conducted his own work, and received a perfect "ovation." Of the "Golden Legend" it suffices to say that the solos were efficiently sung by Madame Albani, Miss Ravogli, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Lane Wilson, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

In Thursday morning's selection were included the "Eroica" Symphony, two movements from Dr. Stanford's Fifth Symphony, conducted by the composer, and the first two parts of Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio. Of more peculiar importance than these things, at the moment, was Sir Hubert Parry's new work, "A Song of Darkness and Light." The scope and character of this effusion were explained to readers of The Musical Times last month, and I pass on to say that the opinions then given before hearing were, to my mind, justified by the performance. As was expected, the "Tears" chorus distanced, in beauty, charm, and impressive power, all other sections of the work. It is a gem. There are, however, very many passages that approach it in high distinction, although they do not, like it, make a revelation of capacity for the greatest things. Madame Ella Russell gave an excellent account of the solos, and the composer conducted to the end of a quite satisfactory performance. The "Eroica" had a performance which was surprisingly good, considering the conductor's limited experience with such things and the short time which could be spared for rehearsal. In such a place, it need hardly be said, the solemnities of the March were all revealed. Dr. Stanford conducted his own music, as usual, and the two movements for which he was responsible thus enjoyed every advantage of presentation. Their character and claims need not again be discussed, nor am I called upon to enlarge upon the "Christmas" Oratorio or its performance. Here all was familiar. The solo vocalists—Madame Ella Russell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Bispham—were absolutely safe, of course, while no anxiety about the choruses could be entertained in view of an orchestra and a chorus so excellent. In the evening of the same day a large attendance indicated considerable public interest on the score of a programme which contained Dr. Basil Harwood's "Inclina, Domine," Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and a liberal selection from "Judas Maccabæus," from which none of the more popular numbers were omitted. The Psalm—its composer's exercise for his degree—was of course designed principally to show the technical ability which examiners exact; but it is more and, perhaps I may say, better than an academic lucubration. The composer has imaginative force and very considerable resources in expression. I look upon the work as even more interesting by its promise than on account of actual achievement. His future efforts will be watched expectantly. In conducting the Psalm, Dr. Harwood favoured somewhat slower tempi than were demanded, as it seemed to me, by the character and proper effect of some sections. Even in that matter a composer is not always the best judge of what should be done Madame Ella Russell, who worked hard through the festival, answered admirably for the solos, and the members of the chorus, having taken most kindly to Dr. Harwood's piece, were heard at their best. The selection from "Judas" brought a welcome and stirring example of the great old master whose sun will never set. Miss Agnes Nicholls and Miss Jessie King, with Messrs. Jones and Bispham, found in it ample occasion for display of their highest powers; the ensemble was strong and enthusiastic, and all went well. Concerning "The Messiah," which had the largest audience of the week, I need say no more than that Madame Albani, Miss Wilson, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Watkin Mills were engaged in its performance—a sure guarantee of highest merit.

Taking the festival as a whole, its musical success was beyond question, thanks not only to individual performers, but also, in a particular degree, to the new conductor, Mr. Brewer, whose labours during the week carried him to a recognised place among those who wield the baton as to the manner born. Financially, also, most satisfactory results were achieved, Mr. Barrett Cooke, the indefatigable secretary, being able to announce at the stewards' meeting that the receipts came within £100 of the expenditure. He has since informed me that the actual deficit is no more than a nominal sum—something under £50, instead of over £600 as was the case three years ago. This is excellent and so encouraging that Gloucester may warmly be congratulated.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Mr. Robert Newman began his fourth season of Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall, on August 27, and will continue them until the 9th prox. As last year, Mr. Henry J. Wood remains the conductor, Mr. Arthur W. Payne is the principal violin, and Mr. Percy Pitt is the organist and accompanist; but the orchestra has been again re-organised, with the result of there having been secured a remarkably efficient body of instrumentalists. Mr. Newman claims indeed that they are all soloists, and certainly this has been justified by those who have been entrusted with prominent and solo passages in orchestral works and arrangements. No novelties were presented for the first few weeks, but a number of the greatest orchestral works, judiciously interspersed with those of lighter character, were interpreted with unfailing attention to light and shade, magnificent volume of tone, and intelligent phrasing. Following commendable precedent, certain nights in each week have been chiefly set aside to one of the great masters, Wagner being set forth on several Mondays and Beethoven on some Fridays. On other evenings this honour has been shared, Schubert and Mendelssohn, Liszt and Brahms, and Grieg and Massenet being bracketted together. This is no less an excellent procedure than the one-man programme—in fact, in most instances, it is better. Russian music, it is almost needless to say, has been frequently heard. On the 7th ult. the first part of the programme was devoted to Tschaïkowsky, the instrumental works chosen being the remarkable Third Suite in G (Op. 55) and the Fifth Symphony in E. Both these compositions contain magnificent passages, but increasing acquaintance reveals inequalities, and at times a descent to the commonplace at variance with the lofty aim of other portions. The first performance in London was given, on the 14th ult., of the Entr'acte and Airs de Ballet from Tschaïkowsky's first opera "Voevoda" ("The Waywode"), produced in Moscow in January, 1869. Only these pieces, the overture, a song, and an arrangement made by Tschaïkowsky under the name of Cramer remain of the score which was burned by the composer. The excerpts heard on this occasion do not possess great musical interest, but they are attractive by reason of the likeness of the principal themes to Russian folk-songs. The other works by this composer presented on this evening were the fourth Suite (Op. 61), "Mozartiana," the fourth Symphony in F minor (Op. 36), and the now popular "Casse Noisette" Suite. A new overture, entitled "Othello," by Clarence Lucas, was played for the first time at the concert on the 20th ult. This is based on three themes severally suggested by the temperaments of the three principal characters in Shakespeare's tragedy. That of Iago dominates the introductory Andante, and those of Othello and Desdemona provide the first and second subjects of the Allegro, the former in G minor, the latter in D. These themes possess individuality in a measurable degree and of course afford excellent contrasts. The development is somewhat too concise, but this is a good fault, and the orchestration is not only well balanced, but is often charming and imparts to the work a poetic character which greatly enhances the artistic value of the work. The same evening Miss Madeline Payne, the Erard scholar at the Guildhall School of Music, made her first appearance at an important orchestral concert, and played the solo part of Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto with a sympathetic touch and command of the keyboard that promise well for her future attainments. Four novelties were presented on the 22nd ult., the most important of which were "Four Characteristic Waltzes," by Mr. Coleridge-Taylor. These possess a refinement and charm which are very fascinating. Sections of languorous expression are admirably contrasted with others of impassioned and lively character, and the monotony of the waltz rhythm is dispelled by ingenious and attractive devices. As they are published for the pianoforte, they will doubtless become well known in musical homes. Another clever composition was a Valse Brillante, by Mr. W. H. Reed, a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music and one of the first violins in Mr. Newman's orchestra. This waltz possesses great vivacity and it gained for its composer the Charles Mortimer prize at the Academy. It is effectively scored and is decidedly promising, since Mr. Reed is only twenty-three years of age. The other novelties were a rhythmic "Festmarsch" (Op. 29), by Mr. Karl Valentin, and a vocal waltz, by Mr. J. M. Coward. Several new vocalists have appeared, the most noteworthy being Mr. Ellison van Hoose, who made his first appearance in England on the 5th ult. He possesses a genuine tenor voice of rich quality, and his singing indicates an artistic temperament and excellent training. Miss Helen Culver, who made her début here on the 3rd ult., has a rich toned voice of exceptional compass, which is admirably controlled. She is an American, but has studied for a considerable period in Paris. Madame Kate Bensberg, who appeared on the 17th ult., is also an American, has studied under Madame Marchesi in the French capital, and has achieved considerable success in opera on the Continent. She possesses a soprano voice which has been well cultivated, and executes florid passages with certainty and ease. Mention should also be made of the first appearance, on the 15th ult., of Miss Ellen Beach Yaw, who possesses a phenomenally high voice.

SAVOY THEATRE.

The revival of "Trial by Jury" and "The Sorcerer," on the 22nd ult., at the Savoy Theatre, was welcomed by an enthusiastic audience with the warmth that savoured of a first night. This is not astonishing. Both works contain some of the best numbers which have emanated from the Gilbert-Sullivan collaboration, and as long as human nature remains as it is, the wit and satire of the librettos will remain fresh. In the notice in these columns of the original production of "The Sorcerer," on November 17, 1877, there occurs the following passage: "To say that the music of Mr. Sullivan is thoroughly well adapted to the libretto is only to state a portion of the truth; for it seems as if every composition had grown up in the mind of the author as he wrote the words. If humour, wit, and satire can be expressed in music, assuredly many portions of this opera are as excellent specimens of this class of composition as can well be imagined." This criticism may be emphatically endorsed to-day. None of the original cast is to be found in the present company, but the work is admirably interpreted. Miss Ruth Vincent is a fascinating heroine, Miss Brandram, who appeared as Lady Sangazure at the revival of the work at the Savoy in 1884, again sustains the same part, Mr. Walter Passmore is the irrepressible John Wellington Wells, Mr. H. A. Lytton is an estimable Vicar, and Mr. Robert Evett, as Alexis, uses a genuine tenor voice with skill and dramatic perception. Other characters are well sustained by Miss E. McAlpine, Miss Emmie Owen, and Messrs. James Hewson and Leonard Russell, and an efficient chorus and orchestra well sustain the reputation for artistic completeness of the Savoy Theatre.

MR. FREDERICK CORDER'S MUSIC TO "THE TERMAGANT."

For some years past theatrical managers have shown increasing appreciation of the advantages arising from the assistance of appropriate music, not only between the acts of plays, but also during the progress of the action. Entr'actes may not be listened to in the theatre with the attention common in the concert-room, but movements in sympathy with the story being told exert an influence which, though in some cases unconsciously exercised, is none the less present. May be only a few bars of a suave melody or of an agitated movement catch the attention of the thoughtless, amidst participation in conversation concerning the fate of the empire or the price of salmon; but music insensibly creates an atmosphere, and even a few phrases suggest a sentiment of some kind, and, when such are in sympathy with the efforts of the actors, make their endeavours more telling. This is specially noticeable when music is heard during the progress of a play, and the fact is now so widely recognised that dramatic incidental music has become a distinct branch of the art. At first thought it would seem an easy task to provide such music, but in reality it is one of peculiar delicacy and subtlety. It must suggest directly, but never obtrude. It must connect the principal events of the tale, accentuate the passion of the moment, deftly whisper the idea prompting the action, presage coming evil, foretell approaching joy. It must be an Ariel, a Puck, a Will-o'-the-Wisp, an intangible, invisible spirit, but the vibration of whose wings is always felt. These requirements have never been more happily fulfilled than in Mr. Corder's music to Messrs. Louis N. Parker and Murray Carson's four-act play "The Termagant," produced on the 1st ult. at Her Majesty's Theatre. The first number is a tersely developed overture which, after some staccato chords, starts with a vigorous theme of insistent character. This is contrasted by a second subject of great melodic beauty given out on the clarinet, and is at once suggestive of a Leitmotif, which it subsequently proves to be. During the first act, while the Princess is holding a "Court of love," some charming music is discoursed behind the scenes, special prominence being given to flutes and harp. The relation by Roderigo of his adventurous voyage is also accompanied by some admirably illustrative strains. The first entr'acte is a "Spanish Dance," innocent, however, of castanets and the usual means employed to obtain local colour, and depending for the justification of its title on clever use of characteristic rhythm and form. Some of the best incidental music is heard during the progress of the subsequent act, and that which accompanies the Termagant's confession of her love to the well attains an amorous intensity that is as remarkable for its power as for its purity. The same sentiment breathes in the second entr'acte, which is most fascinating, and a dainty trio for female voices, sung by the Termagant's ladies-in-waiting to attract her attention, is a memorable feature in the third act. Hate, love, and despair seem to alternately find expression in the third entr'acte. The themes are treated with consummate skill and the movement raises expectation and accentuates the wayward emotions of the self-willed heroine in a striking manner. In the last act the minstrels behind the scenes again play, and the drop of their music into the minor key practically suggests the tragic close of the work. The music was excellently rendered on the first night, under the direction of the composer, who, we understand, is arranging some of it for performance in the concert-room.

REVIEWS.

Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast. A Cantata for Tenor Solo, Chorus, and Orchestra. Composed by S. Coleridge-Taylor. Op. 30. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

This paper has for several years past spoken of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor as a "coming man," and drawn attention in the most pointed manner to his quite exceptional gifts as a composer. The originality and strength of his music, the absence of commonplaces and cheap effects, and the beauty of theme and workmanship in his best works have been a source of genuine delight to the writer, who has not only studied all of Mr. Taylor's published works, but knows and admires others still in manuscript. Mr. Taylor is the youngest of our "young" composers; he is certainly one of the strongest. His individuality is impressed upon everything he produces, from the simplest song of twenty bars to a long symphony, or the present cantata. In the days of Mr. Taylor's Sturm und Drang period, only a few years ago, he sometimes produced works which, in their untrammelled boisterousness, not to say wildness, savoured of that "barbarity" which we find in the worst—i.e., most intensely "national"—Russian music, though Mr. Taylor's thematic material and methods had nothing whatever in common with the Russian naturalistic school. For our young composer has always been himself and nobody else. There is certainly no trace of the influence of Brahms in his music, a very remarkable fact, considering that he has studied at the Royal College of Music, where Brahms is worshipped almost above all other masters. The one composer whose influence may be traced in Mr. Taylor's works, though only in his rhythms and occasionally in the persistent use of a short figure of accompaniment, is Dvorák. And here we may make bold to say that since that evening in St. James's Hall, fifteen years ago, when the Bohemian master's wonderful "Stabat Mater" came to us like a new and beautiful revelation, no work has so impressed us with the feeling of being in the presence of a fresh individuality, a new power in music, as has this cantata of Mr. Taylor's. We do not mean to suggest that "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" is a work of the calibre of Dvorák's opus summum; it is only a modest effort by the side of that masterpiece. But bearing in mind the fact that our composer was only twenty-two when he wrote this cantata, we are forced to the conclusion that everything almost will be possible to the musician who, at this early age, could produce a work so fresh, so strong, so beautiful. It is a distinct creation, and as such we hail it with the rarest delight and the warmest welcome. "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," which occupies fifty-eight pages of octavo vocal score, may almost be said to be constructed upon a few simple tunes, which are rhythmically the direct musical expression of the words. But such is the art of our young composer—and in his careful use of his subject-matter he shows that he has taken a valuable lesson from his master, Professor Stanford—that, in spite of the almost unlimited repetition of such phrases as—no feeling of monotony is allowed to mar our enjoyment of the music. These and other phrases are so spontaneous, and they are subjected to so many clever metamorphoses, that the ear never grows tired of them. The whole work is, in fact, not only full of interest throughout, but accumulative in this respect as well as in power and beauty, till, from the charmingly naïve phrase commencing (p. 32)— and leading, vid this tender, expressive passage for voices unaccompanied—

into the really lovely tenor solo, "Onaway, beloved" (one of the most perfect specimens of pure musical beauty produced in recent years), we have a display of vigour and tenderness combined of which any living composer might be proud. There is nothing of "pupil's music" about this really fine example of Mr. Taylor's powers. A born musician, a young master rejoicing in his youth and strength, speaks to us here in a beautiful language more congenial to him than speech; a language moreover that, while delighting musicians and music-lovers, can also be "understanded of the people," so direct is it in utterance, so forceful in expression, so deep and true in feeling. The exigencies of space forbid our entering into a detailed analysis of the work, but we may draw attention to a few salient points. Of these not the least remarkable is the fact that, in spite of the monotonous rhythm and peculiar style of the poem—a rhythm and style that are easily burlesqued, as vide Mr. W. S. Gilbert's funny specimen in "Princess Toto"—the strength and variety of Mr. Taylor's musical rhythms are quite remarkable, while he steers with a strong hand, boldly and successfully, between the Scylla of clever, "learned" writing and the Charybdis of "barbaric" license and an excess of that local colour which the poem seems to invite. Few composers would have ventured on a musical setting of a long selection from Longfellow's poem, for it cannot be said that the lengthy passages descriptive of Indian customs and costumes are exactly the kind of verse that "yearns for musical expression." But the poem appealed to Mr. Taylor's imagination. Our young Parsifal rushed in where "angels," learned and wise, would have feared to tread, and he dared to set "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" as a cantata. The result justifies his confidence, for after perusing the score we seem to feel instinctively that if there was a successful way of setting the poem, then this is the way, and none other is possible. What could be more straightforward and spontaneous than this music, what more natural and delightful than the way in which he leads up to and produces his powerful climaxes? The means are as nothing compared with the effect produced. Study the few pages dealing with this striking phrase—and note what our young composer makes of it. This sort of music refreshes us like a breath of bracing moorland air on a stifling day. And that Mr. Taylor possesses the higher qualities of head and heart which alone can produce really beautiful and noble music will be learned from many a poetic and romantic page in this work. We would especially single out the tenor solo, already referred to, the more or less unaccompanied passages preceding it, and the last five pages, where Mr. Taylor reaches his highest level. There is real grip, real heart and soul about this music. To be sure, it is all very simple and natural and not at all "profound." But if "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" cannot perhaps be called a great work, these simple and natural outpourings of our young friend are prophetic of great things in the future. Here is a real, Heaven-sent musician, and we feel inclined to quote Schumann àpropos of Chopin: "Hats off, gentlemen, a genius!"

Twelve Songs. By Landon Ronald.
Since we parted. Absence. Written by the Earl of Lytton (Owen Meredith). Composed by Frances Allitsen.
[Metzler and Co., Limited.]

Mr. Landon Ronald's songs show talent that has been well trained, appreciation of the value of finish of detail, and intimate knowledge of what is effective, both for the voice and the pianoforte. These qualities should insure the attention of cultured vocalists. The subject throughout the book is love, and mostly love of the fervid kind. Several of the lyrics, however, have been well chosen, and in these the music attains happy sympathy with the words. This is notable in the setting of Shelley's "Love's Philosophy," the passionate whirl of the lines finding eager echoes in the accompanying strains. "To look on thee," the words by Paul England, also possesses perfect accord between text and music, and much genuine pathos is contained in "Could I but weep."

Miss Allitsen's songs are both worthy of her esteemed pen. "Since we parted" is very short, but very sweet, and the music accentuates the ardent affection which the words express. The manly sentiment which breathes in the text of "Absence" also animates the music, which rushes on with emphatic spontaneity and determined impulse.

Novello's School Music. A Merry Christmas. Cantata. Words by Shapcott Wensley. Music by Thomas Facer.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

No better description can be given of the design of this work than is contained in the preface, which runs as follows: "The cantata opens with a general praise of Christmas time. Then follow allusions to the pleasant re-unions and the merry round games familiar to all. The number entitled 'The Rival Dances' sets forth the respective allurements of 'The Waltz,' 'The Polka,' and the evergreen 'Old Sir Roger de Coverley.' A jocund carol by some singers 'outside in the snow' prompts kindly feelings ever associated with the season, and all ends merrily to the sound of the Christmas bells. The aim has been to provide a school cantata which shall combine brevity and brightness." The work comprises six numbers, and begins with a chorus, "We've placed all our books aside," written in two parts for sopranos and contraltos. The music is in 6-8 time and well expresses the satisfaction of holiday anticipations. It is followed by a duet, descriptive of the enjoyments of the Christmas season at home, the voice parts occasionally answering each other in effective but simple manner. This leads to a short choral recitative for the first and second sopranos respectively, and is followed by a series of vivacious choruses in two parts in praise of the waltz, the polka, and "Sir Roger de Coverley," and severally written in the rhythm of these favourite measures. The fifth number is a melodious Christmas carol, also in two parts for chorus, to which, however, is added a part for a soprano soloist, who comments upon the efforts of the choral singers. This number is ingeniously devised to produce the greatest effect by the simplest means, and the result can scarcely fail to interest its singers and its listeners. The finale is opened with some short passages for the soprano and contralto soloists, after which the chorus enters with a gay tune in 9-8 time and finishes the cantata in a spirited manner.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. (For Advent and Christmas.) Nos. 572, 574, 582, 586, 587.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Recent additions to this series are suitable for the Advent and Christmas seasons. No. 572, entitled "Ye holy angels bright," is intended for All Saints' Day, and is composed by Henry W. Richards, who has set No. 546 of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," for four-part chorus and soprano or tenor solo, in a musician-like manner, that would interest the singers of a well-trained choir. "There shall come forth a star" (No. 574) is suitable for Christmas and is written by Orlando A. Mansfield. This opens with a chorus of emphatic character, which is succeeded by a passage for bass solo, which, however, may be taken by the tenors and basses in unison. The chorus then takes up the music, which finishes in a vigorous style. "In the beginning was the Word" (No. 582), by Ferris Tozer, is of course intended for Christmas, and is an excellent example of this season's Church music. After a few bars of recitative for tenors and basses in unison there comes a melodious soprano solo. The chorus which follows consists of four sections, respectively marked Moderato, Allegro, Adagio, and Allegro, and the last, in 3-4 measure, has for its chief subject a spirited theme, which is treated with considerable vigour, but without difficulties beyond the capabilities of average church choirs. An anthem of devotional character, richly harmonised in four parts, will be found in No. 586, entitled "My soul truly waiteth," composed by Bruce Steane. It is for general use, but would be particularly suitable in Advent. Some antiquarian interest pertains to No. 587, an anthem for Christmas, entitled "Behold my servant," composed by Sir Frederick Bridge, the words of the final movement being taken from the "Sarum Missal" and the music, in four parts, being derived from an "Ave Maria" of the sixteenth century, attributed to Arcadelt. The composer has made most effective use of this material, and preceded it by three well conceived sections, the first and third of which are written for basses in unison.

Three Shadows. Song. Written by D. G. Rossetti. Composed by Alex. S. Beaumont.

Three Songs. Words by Shelley. Music by Arthur Fox.

Folle Farine. Danse piquante pour pianoforte. Par T. H. Frewin.

[Charles Woolhouse.]

The signature of modern music has been wittily defined as the key in which the piece is not written, and on taking up the setting of the "Three Shadows" this definition seems very apt. With a signature of two sharps the music starts in D minor; at the sixth bar it glides into G minor, shortly afterwards arrives at the key of F, and a chord of D major does not occur until the twenty-first bar, when it accompanies the words "In that sweet solitude." Although, however, the eyes of the accompanist are kept in expectation of the unexpected, the efforts of the composer to reflect and intensify the spirit of the poem have been dictated by artistic perception, and the song, which is designed for a baritone voice, deserves recognition and favour.

Mr. Fox's songs have for their text Shelley's poems "Her voice did quiver," "The faded violet," and "I arise from dreams of thee." The first two are allied to music in waltz rhythm and are easy to sing and play. The third calls for more agility from the accompanist, but contains little real difficulty, while the passion of the words are adequately echoed in the voice part.

Mr. Frewin has written a gay and pretty piece which is well suited to pianists of moderate abilities.

The Sacred Choralæon. [Hull: Thomas Shaw.]

This is a collection of hymns suitable for anniversary festivals of Sunday Schools and Bands of Hope. Many of the hymns are old favourites at such meetings, and in some cases are allied to familiar tunes. The new settings are well designed to meet the requirements of such occasions, and in all cases the ordinary notation is supplemented by that of the tonic sol-fa.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Two-part Songs for Female Voices. Nos. 108—110.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

The three numbers recently added to this series deserve widespread acceptance. No. 108, entitled "Golden Silences," is a setting by G. F. Huntley of some suggestive lines by Christina Rossetti. The part-song begins in a meditative manner, the voices answering each other in free imitative passages. Subsequently the music becomes more animated and concludes with a well worked-up climax. The same poet and musician provide the next number, called "Bird Raptures." This is extremely gay and vivacious, and were it sung after "Golden Silences" would form an effective contrast. No. 110 is the beautiful two-part song "Doubt not Thy Father's care," from Edward Elgar's oratorio "The Light of Life." The assurances of Providential care expressed in the words by the Rev. E. Capel-Cure find singularly happy accentuation in the music, and the canon form in which it is written increases the interest of both executants and listeners. It should be remembered that this was originally intended for soprano and contralto soloists as well as chorus, and the part-writing is so grateful to sing and the compass so moderate that the number should become widely known in the home as a duet.

Take, O take those lips away. Words by Shakespeare. Music by Arthur Somervell.

Love's Apology. Words Anonymous. Music by Arthur Somervell.

Dear Lady. Words by Olive Montague Walford. Music by W. C. Vanderpump.

[Forsyth Brothers.]

Mr. Somervell's talent is much in sympathy with the days of "Queen Bess," and forsooth not without good reason, for in them music was mightily honoured. In the setting of Shakespeare's lyric this sympathy is shown in a striking manner, the smoothness of the flowing voice part, which is eminently singable, having much in common with the music of our forefathers. The harmonic scheme is clever and will interest musicians. The same characteristics pertain to the music of "Love's Apology," the thoroughly English nature of which is increased by the fleeting resemblance of its principal theme to the opening notes of the National Anthem. Both songs are designed for a baritone voice.

"Dear Lady" is an unpretentious little ditty wherein a lover strives to express his devotion to his mistress in spite of the embarrassment which her presence causes him. The vocal part, the compass of which ranges from D below to the fourth space of the treble staff, is of that description which readily fixes itself in the memory, and the accompaniment simply but effectively supports the voice.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 270—273.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

The present instalment of this popular series of compositions for the organ consists of four numbers. The first (No. 270) is a March in E flat, with Pastoral Trio, composed by Mr. B. Luard Selby. The former is a majestic diatonic theme in which syncopation is not altogether absent. After a full close in the tonic key, the Pastoral Trio in A flat, 12-8 time, supervenes. It not only fully justifies its title, but forms an agreeable episode. Avoiding a perfect cadence, this movement gently glides, without break, into a repetition of the march, which, with a befitting coda, is brought to a triumphant conclusion. The dedication is to Mr. Walter Alcock. The honoured name of George Garrett stands as the composer of No. 271, a Fantasie Overture in the key of D, and therefore it is sure to claim attention. The work opens with an Andante moderato in the major key, having an effective staccato, or rather pizzicato, pedal part, accompanying the superstructure of sustained chords. After a full close, Voix celeste and pianissimo, the Allegro begins in the tonic minor and pursues its course with unflagging energy till some effective contrasts are provided between the swell and great manuals. Four bars of quasi-Recit., given to the clarinet, lead to an Andante espressivo in F, 6-8 time, in character quite Garrettic—if the definition may be allowed. This pastoral episode is succeeded by a return of the vigorous Allegro. At the last page the major key holds sway; the music, by slackening in pace, acquires more dignity; pedals in octaves are introduced, though they are quite easy to play; and, to the joy of the possessor of a four-manual organ, the tuba has a glorious opportunity in the last eleven bars. The effectiveness of the composition as a concluding voluntary, or as a recital piece, is beyond dispute; moreover, it presents no special difficulties.

Mr. Hamilton Clarke is the composer of the next number (272). It is a "Gavotte" in the key of F. The melody is what is known as "taking," and the episode, in B flat, with its detached chords, forms an agreeable contrast to that which precedes and follows it. Like Sterndale Bennett's delightful Minuet and Trio in B flat, from his G minor Symphony, the Gavotte finishes, after a tonic pedal, with the plagal cadence. As a lighter specimen of organ music its merits are self-evident. The able organist of Gloucester Cathedral, Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, has been prominently before the public during the past month as the conductor of the Three Choirs Festival. Here we find him as the composer of two pieces for the organ (No. 273). The first is a Melody in A, 3-8 time, Andante con moto, somewhat akin to a pastoral movement by reason of its characteristic pedal points. The simplicity of the piece by no means detracts from its attractiveness as a soft voluntary. Its companion piece is a Minuet and Trio, dedicated to Mr. G. R. Sinclair, organist of Hereford Cathedral. The one-legged pedaller would have no quarter in this piece, and, if for no other reason, its existence may be justified as providing a capital study for the pedals. But it has a value of its own apart from mere technical attributes, which the earnest-minded organist will quickly discern and derive therefrom a corresponding enjoyment in the playing thereof.

Springtime. The Maid and the Elf. Songs. Written and composed by Kate Willis. [Weekes and Co.]

Both these songs merit the attention of those who have studied vocal art, for the music is admirably laid out for the voice and affords many opportunities for the legitimate display of finish and culture. In "Springtime" Miss Willis pleasingly emphasises the fact that, although the period is of brief duration, its animating principle, love, is constant, and can "brighten all life's shade." In the other lyric a sagacious elf gives his opinion that "When e'er a maiden sings tra la" it is because she is in love, a deduction which is quite justified by the "tra las" of the maiden of this song. "The Maid and the Elf" could be made very effective by a soprano singer at a public concert.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The musical season here may be said to have opened on the 5th ult., with a brief engagement of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company. More than usual interest was aroused in the event from Dr. Osmond Carr having, for the first time, assumed the reins of management. As might be expected, several alterations have been made in the personnel of the organisation. The duties of the conductorship have been divided between Mr. Hamish MacCunn and Mr. Harold Vicars—a young musician whose compositions, recently performed in the Queen's Hall, indisputably place him in the ranks of coming composers. These two gentlemen will be assisted, we think wisely, by Herr R. Eckhold, whose knowledge of Wagner must be a distinct advantage to the Company. In regard to the principal vocalists, Madame Lucile Hill has been engaged as prima donna, and, as such, she appeared during the week in Gounod's "Faust" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" with marked success. Dr. Carr is at present in communication with several new English and American soprano singers. Among the tenors, Mr. Barton McGuckin is retained as first tenor and stage director. Miss Kirkby Lunn, who has done good service, has appeared most successfully during the week as Carmen. A special ballet, under the supervision of Madame Cavalazzi-Mapleson, is also engaged, and we understand that, recognising the difficulties of proper provincial productions, Dr. Carr shortly intends engaging a permanent band of from twenty-five to twenty-eight performers to travel with the Company. During the past week the usual popular operas have been given. The chorus contains a number of fresh voices, and there is no reason why the Royal Carl Rosa Opera should not maintain its former renown.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The first concert of the season took place in our Town Hall on Saturday, the 10th ult., and was given by a choir of 600 voices, who formed the local contingent at the eleventh National Co-operative Festival at the Crystal Palace in August. Mr. G. William Williams, of London, conducted, and Mr. George Halliley, in the absence of Mr. C. W. Perkins, most ably accompanied on the organ. The programme, which consisted of sixteen choral numbers, was a precise replica of that given in London.

The introduction of court and alley open-air concerts, similar to those organised at Liverpool, has met with the greatest encouragement. These concerts last one hour, commencing at seven o'clock, and seem to be very highly appreciated by the huge audiences, who listen to each piece with rapt attention. The average attendance at the first eight concerts has been over 900.

Four excellent vocal and instrumental concerts were given last month in the Floral Hall of the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens, under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction. The same director has also issued the list of artists (numbering over ninety) for the forthcoming season of musical matinées in connection with the Royal Society of Artists, the first of which will be held on Saturday, the 8th inst.

The annual meeting of the Birmingham Amateur Orchestral Society was held at the Midland Institute on the 14th ult., under the chairmanship of Councillor Johnstone (President). The hon. secretary (Mr. W. F. Audry), in the thirty-fifth annual report, congratulated the members upon the success of the past session under the conductorship of Mr. George Halford. The president spoke with satisfaction of the great improvement the Society had made in ensemble, and remarked that they had recently produced works which a few years ago no one would have dreamed of hearing at their concerts.

A concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 17th ult., in aid of the Burlington Hall (Aston) Early Morning School for men. Mr. C. W. Perkins presided at the organ, and Mr. A. Nicholas conducted the Burlington Hall singing class, which consisted of a mixed choir of forty voices. Miss Aimée Wathen, Miss Nellie Pritchard, Mr. Fred A. Thomas, and Mr. William Bennett were the solo vocalists. Master J. H. Dean appeared as solo violinist, and Mr. J. A. Clive accompanied.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

There has been little or no musical activity in Bristol for some time. The only public performances have been those given by the three principal male voice societies. The Orpheus Glee Society sang to a very large assemblage of the members of the British Association while they were holding their annual meeting in Bristol. The Bristol gleemen entertained the delegates to the Trades Union Congress, which was also held here, and the Æolian male voice choir took part in a concert at Bath.

Just as preparations are about to be made for the coming season there has occurred a great misfortune which will probably have a serious bearing upon music for many months to come. The Colston Hall, the largest public building in our city suitable for concerts, has been demolished by fire. The great building had already been taken for several musical performances, including those by the Choral Society, which needs a vast audience at each concert to cover expenses. The principal vocalists and the members of the band had, I understand, been engaged for the opening night of the season. The same hall would also be wanted for the Musical Festival next year, if, indeed, it is to be held. The loss, therefore, is serious and has already led to the abandonment of some schemes; but at the time of writing Bristol people had been so busy with the British Association that they had not met for consultation. As to the festival, if it be decided to hold it, the chief question to be considered is, Where shall the performance take place? Several suggestions have been made, the principal one being that the sacred works be rendered in the Cathedral and the secular selections in the Drill Hall or the Victoria Rooms. On the other hand, it is said that the Colston Hall can be re-constructed in time for the festival. If that be so, and guarantees to that effect be forthcoming, no difficulties should arise on that score.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A three days' "National Convention of Music Teachers," organised by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, was held here last month, at which a large variety of papers was submitted. The conference was opened on Thursday evening, the 15th ult., in the University Music Class Room. The opening address should have been delivered by Mr. Hamish MacCunn, but one hour before the time of meeting the president received a telegram from that gentleman containing the information that he had been appointed conductor of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, and that rehearsals, &c., would prevent him keeping his engagement. He sent his warmest congratulations to the meeting, and assured the members that he was with them in spirit. Of course, on such short notice it was impossible to fill the Scottish composer's place, and the meeting proceeded at once to the second paper—one by the president, Mr. J. Spencer Curwen. Other papers were submitted at the first and two following meetings by Messrs. Cuthbert Hadden, Duncan Fraser, Walter Hately, Mrs. Emil Behnke, and others; but it cannot be said that the papers or the discussions which followed threw much light or leading on the path of teachers gathered together.

The plan of campaign for the winter season in Edinburgh shows no feature of outstanding interest save the appearance of Herr Wilhelm Bruch, from Stuttgart, as the conductor of Messrs. Paterson's series of orchestral concerts. The programmes are rich in promise, and seem to desire to return to the treasures of classical music. The ranks of the various vocal societies are quite full already, and new societies have issued prospectuses and appeals. Everything points to a busy and an interesting season.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The new organisation for carrying on the Choral and Orchestral Concerts in Glasgow during next winter has so far made the following arrangements:—

The season will extend over a period of twelve weeks, commencing on Monday, November 28. The number of classical concerts will be thirteen—nine orchestral and four choral—including the customary performance of "The Messiah." There will also be the usual series of Saturday Popular Concerts.

The choral works already announced include Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," "Elijah," and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's opera "Diarmid," for the first time on a concert platform. In the absence of stage action and scenic effects the joint workmanship of the Marquis of Lorne and the young Greenock composer may reveal even fresh beauties in "Diarmid." The experiment cannot fail to be followed with much interest. The orchestral programmes are being arranged "so as to include interesting classical works, as also new and important examples of the modern school." Hitherto the programmes appeared to have been framed for the benefit of a limited few, and this has proved a great mistake.

The distinguished vocal soloists already engaged include Madame Ella Russell, Misses Marie Brema, Jenny Taggart, Kirkby Lunn, and Ada Crossley; Messrs. Ben Davies, Braxton Smith, Andrew Black, Daniel Price, and Mr. Santley. The solo violinists are Lady Hallé, Miss Leonora Jackson, and Mr. Maurice Sons, and the pianists include Madame Teresa Carreño, Mr. Frederic Lamond, and M. Busoni. Mr. Joseph Bradley will, as formerly, conduct the choral concerts, and the orchestral performances will, of course, be directed by Mr. Wilhelm Bruch, the new conductor of the Scottish Orchestra, concerning whose career a notice has already appeared in The Musical Times. The band will number eighty performers, with Mr. Sons as principal first violin. It is pleasing to record that the guarantee fund already exceeds £4,500.

On the evening of the 20th ult. Mr. James Airlie, the veteran secretary of the City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts, read a paper to the Glasgow Society of Musicians entitled "Reminiscences of Musical Events and Musical Progress in Glasgow." Mr. Airlie's long experience of concert management, and his knowledge of men and things, entitle him to speak with authority, and, as was generally expected, his paper proved both interesting and instructive.

The prospectus of the Harrison Concerts gives some interesting particulars regarding the four concerts to be given in October, November, February, and March next. The scheme includes one new feature—the "Harrison" Orchestra, selected, it is stated, exclusively from the Richter, Hallé, Mottl, and the London Philharmonic bands. The orchestra will be conducted by Mr. G. Jaeger.

After an interregnum of eight years the Pollokshields Lyrical Society has resumed rehearsals under the direction of its energetic founder, Mr. D. Maccoll. This capable musician has, indeed, a record possessing many features of interest, and his choir had, it will be remembered by local amateurs, the distinction of giving (after the Dedicatory Service by the Choral Union) the opening and closing concerts in connection with the Glasgow International Exhibition of 1888.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A visit of the rehabilitated Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company to the city of its earliest triumphs has been the event of the past month round which the greatest amount of popular interest has gathered. It was at the old Amphitheatre, which subsequently became the Royal Court, that the late chief of the organisation personally conducted many memorable performances more than twenty years ago. At that time Carl Rosa had control of a compact body of artists—band, chorus, and soloists—all of whom were thoroughly competent. Special attention was directed to the visit of the Company under its new management, for Liverpool has long been regarded as the headquarters of English opera at its best in this century. At the Shakespeare Theatre a brief stay was made from the 12th to the 17th ult., and the following week was devoted to the adjacent town of Birkenhead. Dr. Osmond Carr had decided upon giving the performances at popular prices, a matter which at once brought him into sympathetic touch with the public. It was understood that the old Rosa standard of a good all-round ensemble was the great thing aimed at by the present management and in the result such expectation was fully realised. The operas given have been the most popular of the old répertoire. The conductors have been Messrs. Hamish MacCunn, Vicars, and Eckhold. Mr. Barton McGuckin has lent the great weight of his experience to the management of the stage, and Dr. Osmond Carr personally controlled the whole undertaking. The latter has been in every respect worthy of the traditions of the famous Company.

The Philharmonic rehearsals began early in September, under Mr. H. A. Branscombe. The chorus is not, however, to be engaged in important work till November 8, when Verdi's "Stabat Mater" and Te Deum and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" will be given. The Musical Society has made an excellent start under Mr. F. H. Crossley, and the new conductor appears to have deservedly won the esteem of all concerned. "Elijah" is fixed for the first performance, on the 15th prox. The same conductor has in hand "Creation" at Warrington, but the scheme of his Newton-le-Willows choir is not yet fixed. An attempt is being made to form a large choral society at New Brighton Tower, under Mr. Granville Bantock. It ought to succeed, as this gentleman has command of a fine orchestra and a splendid concert-room. The Post Office Choral Society, under Mr. Clark, has elected to give "The Messiah" at its one annual concert of importance. The Sunday Society has issued an important syllabus in which Mr. Argent's new chorus figures as an important factor, "Elijah" being fixed for the 30th inst. as its initial effort. A large number of other musical organisations, such as the Rhondda Choir and the Goossens Choir, have been also laid under contribution, as have also a goodly catalogue of clever musical people, among whom figure the names of the Dolmetsch Party, Mr. Charles Fry, and others of national repute.

The long established and decidedly popular Schiever Quartet intend to give their usual series of performances. Mr. Lawson's new venture in the same direction appears to bid well for popular favour. Mr. Thomas Shaw has announced a capital series of concerts for his coming season. Messrs. Harrison are, it is understood, to give us a liberal bill of fare, and people are on the look out for the prospectus of the winter evening entertainments. At the College of Music, Messrs. Welsing and Courvoisier are to give recitals of Beethoven's sonatas for pianoforte and violin, and a feature of the winter term will be a series of concerts of music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Extending the plan adopted last winter, there will be a short break in the continuity of the Hallé concerts at Christmas. There has always been a difficulty at the turning of the years, and sometimes an endeavour has been made to meet it by providing programmes of a lively character, supposed to be suited to the tastes and capacities of the young people then holiday-making and of others not, in the festive season, disposed to settle down to the study of very serious music; but the efforts have never met with complete success, and this winter a fortnight will be allowed for the recovery of a healthy keenness of appetite; so that no performance will be given on Thursdays, December 29 and January 5. The concerts will be resumed on the 20th inst.

The new arrangements, while tending to secure the permanence of an institution of so much importance, not only to this city but to the whole of the Northern portion of the country, will, happily, not interfere with the purely artistic or the business management of the subscription series of Thursday evening concerts. The unique experience which Messrs. Forsyth Brothers have gained during the past forty years will yet guide and control the engagements entered into, as well as the general arrangements and the increased spirit which Mr. Cowen has infused into the provision and performance of the music may still be depended upon by all those zealous students who have, with unremitting interest, watched the course of events during a period of some danger and anxiety. The excellence of the band will, certainly, not be allowed to wane; and the choir, which Mr. Wilson has carefully weeded and pruned, will still have the benefit of his care and energy. The best evidence of the continued and increasing interest of the public is shown by the welcome announcement that the applications for seats far exceed those of any recent year, and more than justify the liberality of the engagements which have been made with all the leading available artists. M. Paderewski will appear on December 8, and will probably present, under Mr. Cowen's direction, a new work of special interest here. M. de Pachmann will, after a long absence, again favour us with those interpretations of the more poetic Chopin effusions which form his specialty. M. Busoni, at his first visit toManchester, created an intense desire to have further opportunities of judging the versatility of his talent as well as the boldness of his style; and it need not be said that no pianist will meet with a more cordial welcome than our countryman, Mr. Leonard Borwick.

It is to be earnestly hoped that the fresh bereavement which has befallen Lady Hallé may not interfere with her two promised visits. Dr. Joachim will also come twice; the many friends of Mr. Willy Hess will cordially greet his visit; and the rapid and continued advance which Mr. Carl Fuchs has made during the last two seasons lead to very high anticipations of the future of our Manchester violoncellist. The long list of vocalists secured shows the zeal of the management and an earnest desire to leave nothing undone which might tend to the enjoyment of the patrons.

But every succeeding season has proved more and more conclusively the growth and expansion of an interest centred not in the solo performances, however excellent, but in the extension of the orchestral répertoire, in the more prompt presentation of new works, and in the more finished interpretation of the great masterpieces of musical art. Mr. Cowen promises not only to go through the whole series of Beethoven's symphonies (as Sir Charles Hallé did some years ago), but also to give us fresh enjoyment drawn from the works of Tschaikowsky, Brahms, Dvorák, and César Franck, without withholding the Symphonic Variations of Sir Hubert Parry, which perhaps we might have been favoured with last winter. Mr. Edgar F. Jacques will continue to write the analytical programmes, the interest of which will be increased by the addition of musical examples.

The delightful chamber concerts, the profits of which Mr. Brodsky so unselfishly devotes to the aid of the more promising young students of the College of Music, are also attracting increased sympathy. The destruction of the hall in which they have hitherto been held necessitates their transference to other quarters. The large room of the neighbouring Young Men's Christian Association has been greatly improved in many ways, and it is clear that Mr. Brodsky's zeal and earnestness have secured an attention which will carry him triumphantly through any temporary difficulty.

To the elegant little Comedy Theatre the Moody-Manners English Opera Company has, during a brief season, succeeded in attracting very satisfactory audiences, and, although time has not yet sufficed to bring about absolute smoothness and completeness of performance, there are several young artists of considerable promise, and the progress of the Company will be watched with interest.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Next year's Festival is beginning to occupy the attention of the local musical world, but it is too distant to materially affect concert enterprise in the city and district and we are promised a busy and interesting season. The Festival, which is fixed for October 11, 12, and 13, 1899, will mark an advance on the previous one, both in scope and in the interesting character of the works to be performed. It is particularly satisfactory that a new work by Dvorák will have Sheffield as its birthplace, and the inclusion in the programme of Parry's "King Saul" will delight the many local admirers of the composer of "Job." The other works announced are Elgar's "King Olaf," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Spohr's "Last Judgment," the "Hymn of Praise," the "Golden Legend," and "The Messiah." Mr. August Manns will again conduct.

The Amateur Musical Society (Mr. Schollhammer) will perform the "Creation" at the winter concert. The Choral Union (Mr. S. Suckley) is rehearsing Handel's "Theodora." The Musical Union (Dr. Coward) announces Gluck's "Orpheus," in which work Miss Marie Brema will sing, and "Acis and Galatea."

The Male Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. J. A. Rodgers) will perform Lloyd's "Longbeard's Saga," Thomas's "The Tyrol," and other works on November 29. The Society will be assisted by Mr. Charles Fry. Gounod's "Redemption" will be given in St. Mary's Church on the 10th inst., under Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

The other events of the season will include a Richter concert, a De Pachmann recital, a second series of chamber concerts promoted by Miss Marie Foxon, and the usual number of Harrison concerts.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" will be performed on the 17th inst. by a special chorus under Mr. S. Suckley, the proceeds being in aid of the widow and family of the late Mr. A. Bayles, a well-known local vocalist.

The St. Cecilia Musical Society is suspended for the season, pending future developments.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given at Cherry-tree on the 12th ult., under the direction of Mr. A. E. Trenerey.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The abnormal heat which we have been experiencing of recent weeks has considerably retarded the usual revival at this time of the year of musical activity. At the Opéra preparations have been going forward for some time for the resumption, at an early date, of the performances of "Die Walküre," which were such a source of attraction during last season, with M. Demauroy, a laureate of this year's concours at the Conservatoire, in the part of Siegmund. "Gauthier d'Aquitaine," by M. Vidal, the next novelty to be brought out here, is now being actively rehearsed. The performances of opera which have been for some time taking place at the Théâtre des Variétés are meeting with much appreciation, and it may well be that the theatre will eventually develop into a regular opera house.

A highly interesting artistic event was the performance, on August 28, of the drama "Déjanire," by M. Louis Gallet, with music by M. Saint-Saëns. The representation took place in the open air, at the Arênes de Béziers, in the presence of some ten thousand spectators. The work, which is in four acts, had been splendidly mounted, great care having also been bestowed upon the important musical portion thereof, there being an orchestra of 250 musicians, 200 choristers, and a strong corps de ballet, recruited chiefly from England. The actors were those of the Odéon, and Mdlle. Armande Bourgeois and M. Duc, of the Opéra, sustained the principal vocal parts. The scenery, which was of an enormous size, had been specially painted, with a view to the open air production, by M. Jambon. The success of the piece was complete, and both author and composer were the recipients of much hearty and well-deserved applause, for there can be no doubt that, apart from the intrinsic merits of the work, the experiment of its production under such novel conditions was a most interesting one. "Déjanire" will be reproduced during the winter months at the Odéon, when M. Colonne will be the conductor.

Musical doings, in other respects, have been lively enough here during the late summer, but they have chiefly taken the form of "musique de Casino" and do not call for any particular mention. There were, however, some exceptions from this general rule, and amongst these may be instanced the very attractive concert given at the Casino Dinard by M. Hardy-Thé, a very excellent baritone, in association with Mdlle. Pacary, of the Covent Garden Theatre. The gifted lady on this occasion scored a considerable success, while M. Hardy was likewise greatly applauded in his artistic interpretation of songs by Bemberg, Lenormand, and Moreau—the latter a highly meritorious pianist-composer.

A fortnight hence all our principal artists will be in town again, and it will not be long then before the season will begin in earnest.

A successful band contest was held at Parson's Green Cricket Ground, on the 8th ult., under the auspices of the London and Home Counties' Amateur Band Association. This Society has been formed by some of the leading bandmasters in the South of England, with a view to securing more support from the public, and also for the purpose of improving the standard of the music performed in order to enable their men to contest with those in the North of England. The Council of the Association consists of Mr. Charles Godfrey (Royal Horse Guards Blue), Mr. C. Kiefert (musical director, Royal Court Theatre), Mr. Warwick Williams (musical adviser to the London County Council), Mr. W. Short (Her Majesty's private band), Mr. J. A. Browne, and Mr. S. Cope. Ten bands, divided into two sections, took part in the contest. At the conclusion of the performances, the judge, Mr. Ord Hume, gave his decision as follows: First section—1, St. Albans City; 2, North London Temperance; 3, Walthamstow Silver; 4, Fulham; 5, Walthamstow Temperance. Second section—1, Barnet; 2, Ilford Horns; 3, divided between Feltham and Epping Forest. Mr. Hume complimented the bands on the display, and said that the music he had listened to showed him that Southern amateur bands were not so bad as they were painted. The prizes were then distributed by Mr. Charles Godfrey, who, after referring to the many contests with which he had been identified in the North of England, and particularly at Belle Vue, Manchester, said he had been pleasantly surprised at the playing by some of the bands. Mr. R. J. Haynes, Holly Cottage, Millfield's Road, Clapton, is the hon. secretary of the Association.

The report and balance sheet of the Musical Society of Victoria for the year ending April 30, 1898, is a most gratifying document, reflecting credit upon all concerned. Artistic enterprise and business management seem to go hand in hand with satisfactory results. There is a Library and a Benevolent Fund, thus mind and body are cared for by the Society. A complete catalogue is about to be issued of the library, and the Benevolent Fund has a credit balance of £106 16s. 8d., which includes an amount of £105 14s. 9d. realised by a concert given by Messrs. Mark and Jakoff Hambourg and Mr. J. Lemmone. The ordinary account of the Society has a balance in hand of about £150, and prosperity prevails. A sentence in the report may be quoted: "Eleven general meetings and musical evenings have been held, the attendance frequently taxing the seating accommodation of our room. The interest shown in the music given has been extremely gratifying." The president of the Society is Mr. E. A. Jaeger, and Mr. W. H. Heathcote, 272, Collins Street, Melbourne, is the hon. secretary. May it continue to flourish more and more.

The Paris municipal authorities have opened a prize competition for a symphony, or dramatic work (soli, chorus, and orchestra), open to French composers only. The very liberal proposal is that if the successful work be a symphony, the sum of 10,000 francs shall be awarded and a public performance be given at the expense of the municipality. If, on the other hand, the prize is gained by a dramatic work, the author, should he prefer its performance in the concert-room, will likewise receive the above sum; but in the event of a scenic performance being desired he will be paid 5,000 francs, while the sum of 25,000 francs will be guaranteed by the authorities to the theatrical manager who may undertake its stage production.

On the 17th ult., at the People's Palace, Handel's "Samson" was performed by Mr. G. Day Winter's choir and orchestra of the Popular Oratorio Concerts, from the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road. The principal soloists were Miss Amy Sargent, Madame Joyce Maas, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Arthur Barlow; Mr. John Solomon played the trumpet obbligato to "Let the bright Seraphim," Mr. Duncan Callow presided at the organ, Miss Kate Griffiths at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. Day Winter was the conductor.

M. Mercier, the well-known Paris sculptor, has just completed the model of the monument to be erected to Gounod in the French capital. It consists of a colossal bust of the composer, surrounded by three female figures representing the heroines of his principal operas—Marguerite, Julia, and Sappho. In the background is a pianoforte, presided over by the Genius of Music. The grouping and general conception of the work are considered to be very spirited and poetical.

Professor Julius Stockhausen, who for many years past has conducted a vocal academy of his own at Frankfort-on-Main, will, we are informed, in future only give private instruction to advanced pupils. He will, however, keep a preparatory school at his residence and under his supervision, where his method will be taught by competent teachers. The great German baritone is in his seventy-first year.

Mr. Frank Winterbottom, bandmaster of the Royal Marine Light Infantry (Plymouth Division), has been giving some excellent performances by the fine band which he conducts at Plymouth during the season under the auspices of the Corporation. The selection of the programmes and the admirable manner in which they were interpreted deserve well merited praise.

Professor Franz Rummel has received from the Imperial Conservatory in Moscow the flattering offer of the position of professor of the higher classes of pianoforte, but this he has not accepted, as he does not yet wish to give up his public career. Professor Rummel will from to-day again take up his residence in Berlin.

A memoir of the late Sir Robert P. Stewart, Professor of Music in the University of Dublin, is now in the press and will shortly be published. Subscribers' names may be sent to the Rev. O. J. Vignoles, care of Messrs. Bumpus and Co, Oxford Street.

The Stock Exchange Male-voice Choir will resume its rehearsals this month, under the direction of Mr. Munro Davison, owing to the continued indisposition of Mr. George Kitchin.

Professor C. Villiers Stanford's successful opera "Shamus O'Brien" is to be produced, in the German language, at the Breslau Stadt-Theater during the coming season.

The comic opera "Fantasio," by Miss Ethel M. Smyth, first brought out some months ago at Weimar, is to be performed shortly at the Court Theatre, Carlsruhe, under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl.

A clarinet quartet party has been organised by M. Manuel Gomez, the members of which will be Messrs. M. and F. Gomez, Percy Egerton, and George Anderson.

Professor Reinhold Hermann, of Berlin, has been appointed conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston (U.S.A.).

Mr. Godwin Fowles has been appointed director of the Luncheon Hour Concerts at the Bishopsgate Institute.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—An interesting contribution to the Coronation celebrations of last month is the publication, under the auspices of the Society of Musical History of the Netherlands, of a series of sixteen marches in use by the army under Prince William of Orange-Nassau, during the Spanish wars of succession (1702-1713). A pianoforte arrangement, à quatre mains, of the collection, by M. Averkamp, has been published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig. Recent festivities have also occasioned the issue of a critically revised version of that characteristic national song "Wilhelmus van Nassauwe," which in the course of time had become somewhat disfigured by "tinkerings."——Miss Fanny Francisca, an American soprano, pupil of Madame Marchesi, has been engaged for the present season at the National Opera House.

Antwerp.—Performances at that interesting and very active national institution, the Flemish Opera, are announced to be resumed in the first week of the present month. Amongst the works to be produced in the course of the new season are Weber's "Abu Hassan," Enna's "Cleopatra," Cesar Cui's "William Ratcliff," and Gevaert's "Quentin Durward." M. Jan Blockx, the successful composer of "De Heerberg-Princes" (which has been accepted for performance by no less than twenty Continental theatres), has nearly completed the score of a new comic opera, entitled "Thyl l'Espiègle" ("Eulenspiegel"), to a libretto by MM. Henri Cain and Lucien Solvay.

Barcelona.—An interesting and highly successful concert was given, on the 2nd ult., by the Orfeo Catala Choral Society, one of the leading musical institutions of Spain, under the direction of Señor A. Millet. The programme comprised numbers by Palestrina, Handel, Mendelssohn, Brahms, and Grieg. A young fourteen-year old prima donna, Señora Barrientos, has appeared in "Lucia" and other Italian operas both at the Novedades and the Lirico, where she aroused indescribable enthusiasm.——Wagner's "Die Walküre" is to be brought out for the first time at the Lirico during the present month. Nothwithstanding enhanced prices of admission (consequent upon the heavy war tax), both theatres and concert-rooms are nightly crowded.

Bayreuth.—Frau Cosima Wagner has in her possession a score of "Rienzi" which Wagner himself at one time revised for the purpose of ordinary performances of the work, and greatly reducing its somewhat inordinate length. His widow, finding "Rienzi" given in more or less mutilated fashion on some operatic stages in Germany, has now decided to publish the composer's own revised version, and the work will, moreover, shortly be mounted by Herr Mahler, at the Imperial Opera, Vienna, in accordance with the master's revised score and with new and magnificent scenery and costumes.

Berlin.—Two weeks after the four hundredth performance, at the Royal Opera, of "Tannhäuser," a similar record was made at this institution, on August 17, in regard to "Lohengrin." The chivalrous Knight of the Swan first appeared at this house on January 23, 1859, and, like his operatic predecessor of Wartburg fame, was received with anything but universal favour. One critic likened the music to "chaos vainly striving to assume, here and there, some definite shape." In the opinion of another, most of the leading characters in the work were "the very types of a puppet show."——The regular season of the Royal Opera commenced on the 1st ult. with a performance of Lortzing's "Czar und Zimmermann." Frau Schumann-Heink, greatly invigorated after her two months' summer vacation, made her appearance a few days later in "Carmen." The season, as regards opera, bids fair to be an exceptionally busy one. At the Friedrich Wilhelmstadt Theater the "Spieloper," or opera with spoken dialogue, is to have its special home. Frau Schumann-Heink, we may add, will start for the United States towards the end of this month to fulfil a six months' engagement there.——The Philharmonic Concerts, under Herr Nikisch's direction, are announced to commence on the 10th inst., and the symphony concerts of the Royal Orchestra, conducted by Herr Weingartner, were to be resumed on the 30th ult. ——An authoritative biography of Carl Loewe, the celebrated composer of Ballads, from the pen of Professor Heinrich Bulthaupt, is about to be published in the "Famous Masters" series, edited by Dr. Reimann, of Berlin.——Professor Karl Klindworth has resigned his position as teacher of the pianoforte and member of the artistic directorate of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium. The esteemed artist will, however, continue to give private instruction to advanced pupils.——At the Ministry of Justice a bill is being prepared with a view to the reform of the present law of the right of authorship, and a commission has been appointed for the purpose of hearing the opinions of experts, which will include several musicians.

Brescia.—An interesting Exhibition of Musical Instruments and Autographs has recently been opened in this town. It includes some very fine stringed instruments by Gaspar de Salo, Nicolas Amati, Maggini, Ruegger, and others, while the section of autographs by celebrated performers and composers is particularly rich; Paganini, De Beriot, Vieuxtemps, Crivelli, Pasta, Rubini, Malibran, and many other noted artists being represented; and there are also many letters written by Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Weber, Schumann, Auber, Gounod, Bizet, Verdi, Donizetti, and a number of others.

Brussels.—The Théâtre de la Monnaie re-opened its doors, on the 5th ult., with Gounod's "Faust," the most popular with the public here of all the operas on the répertoire of this institution. A new ballet, "The Temptation of St. Anthony," by the conductor, M. Flon, will be the first novelty of the present season. Performances in English are to be given at the Alcazar by the Lauri Company during the current month.——The excellent orchestral concerts instituted by M. Ysaye will be resumed on the 16th inst., and will be conducted alternately by the founder and Herr Mottl, M. Ysaye having to fulfil engagements in his capacity of violin virtuoso in Germany and Russia.——An amateur, M. de Groot, has taken out a patent for a new system of violin making. A violin and violoncello of his make, constructed of Italian walnut wood, have recently been tested by a number of experts and pronounced by them scarcely inferior in tone to some of the best Cremonese instruments.

Carlsruhe.—The special performances of opera organised under the direction of Herr Mottl, at the Court Theatre, commenced, on the 9th ult., with a very successful performance of "Lobetanz," the new work by Herr Thuille, of Munich. Amongst other representations during last month were "Die Meistersinger," the "Nibelungen" tetralogy, and Berlioz's "Béatrice et Bénédict." The last-named composer's "La Prise de Troie" was to be given on the 30th ult., and its companion work, "Les Troyens à Carthage," on the 1st inst. Liszt's "Saint Elisabeth" will be given on the 6th inst., "Tristan und Isolde" on the 9th, Gluck's "Orpheus" on the 11th, and the series will terminate, on the 16th inst., with a second performance of "Die Meistersinger." Berlioz's "La Prise de Troie," it may be remarked, has never yet been performed in the composer's native France.——Herr Mottl has been decorated by the Emperor of Austria with the Order of the Iron Crown, a distinction but rarely conferred upon artists.

Cologne.—Herr Weingartner, the distinguished conductor, has completed the score of a new symphony which will be first produced at the second Gürzenich concert next month. A new string quartet of his composition will be introduced by the Halir Quartet Party this season in concerts at Berlin, Leipzig, and Vienna.

Copenhagen.—A new one-act opera, entitled "Hero," by the Danish composer Louis Schyttes, is to be shortly brought out at the Royal Opera.——A very artistic statue of the famous violinist Ole Bull, by the Copenhagen sculptor Sinding, has been on view here recently, previous to its being dispatched to its ultimate destination, Bergen, in Norway.

Dresden.—Herr Kurt Hoesel, a very able musician and orchestral conductor, has been appointed principal of the Royal Conservatorium in succession to the late Professor Krantz.—— The Symphony Concerts, under the direction of Herr Hans Winderstein, which are to be resumed this month, will present some interesting new works, including a Symphony by Anton Klughardt, and another entitled "Ocean Symphony," for orchestra and organ, by Ferdinand Pfohl. Amongst executive artists announced to appear during the season are Mesdames Carreño, Schumann-Heink, and Lehmann-Kalisch, and Mr. Eugene d'Albert. ——Herr Ludwig Hartmann, the distinguished musical littérateur, has resigned his position of musical critic on the Dresdner Zeitung, and has become associated, in a similar capacity, with the Dresdner Neueste Nachrichten, one of the most widely read papers in the Saxon capital.

Hamburg.—A handsome marble monument has recently been erected over the grave, in the Ohlshorf cemetery, of the late B. Pollini (alias Pohl), the well-known impresario and successful director of the Stadt-Theater.

Leipzig.—M. Paderewski some time since offered a prize of three thousand marks for a new symphony, which has now been awarded, out of a number of competitors, to Herr Sigismund von Stojowski, a young Polish musician, residing in Paris. Professor Reinecke was president of the jury.——Spinelli's lyrical drama "A basso Porto" was produced at the Stadt-Theater, for the first time, on the 9th ult., with immense success.

Madrid.—Mascagni's "Zanetto" was brought out at the Retiro Theatre, last month, by an Italian company, but so coldly received that it was not considered advisable to repeat the performance.——Wagner's "Liebesmahl der Apostel" is about to be produced by the San Sebastian Musical Society, with the co-operation of the Bilbao Choir, under the direction of Señor A. Goni.

Milan.—The famous Conservatory of this town is henceforth to be known as the "Conservatorio Giuseppe Verdi," a Royal decree having just been issued to that effect, and the fact having been notified to the veteran composer by the Minister of Public Instruction in highly flattering terms. The matter is not without its ironical side. When, in 1832, young Verdi presented himself at the Milan Institution to undergo the necessary examination for his admission as a pupil, the examining professors unanimously decided against it, on the ground that "the candidate possessed no musical talent whatever." Time has wrought its revenges, and the composer of "Traviata" has often been heard to remark that had he entered the Conservatorio, his career might have become simply that of a teacher, leaving him but little time for developing his creative gifts.

Rome.—Signor Domenico Cotogni, who for some years past has been a resident vocal teacher at St. Petersburg, has been appointed to a professorship at the St. Cecilia Academy. Signor Cotogni will be remembered by London opera goers as the leading baritone, for many years, at the Royal Italian Opera, during the management of the elder Gye.——The Italian Government having apparently decided upon a policy of retrenchment, amongst the first to be affected thereby will be, curiously enough, the military bands, of which there are at present 112. According to the projected reforms on the part of the War Ministry, the army bands are to be reduced to forty-eight, whereby, it is said, an annual saving of some three millions of lire will be effected. The project meets with decided disapproval in artistic circles and in the press.

Ruhla (Thuringia).—Under the auspices of the Mayence Choral Society "Liederkranz," a commemorative tablet was unveiled last month at the house where the organist and composer, Friedrich Lux, was born. Several of his compositions were performed on the occasion by the Mayence Society, whose conductor Lux had been for many years.

St. Petersburg.—In accordance with a recently issued Imperial ukase, the members of the Court Orchestra are required, in future, to be Russian subjects, and to wear specially designed uniforms at all Court festivities. After ten years' service they will be entitled to a pension of 1,000 roubles for the solo performers and of 700 roubles for the remainder. In former days the Imperial orchestra consisted for the most part of German musicians.——An order of the Ministry of the Interior prohibits the publication in Russia of any arrangements of the music appertaining to the liturgy of the Orthodox Church. Some rather fanciful transcriptions of the chants have, it would appear, been made of recent years, to the extent even of their utilisation as dance tunes, a proceeding which the authorities not unnaturally look upon as a profanation.——Both Dr. Hans Richter and Herr Mottl have been engaged to conduct some of the Symphony Concerts of the St. Petersburg Philharmonic Society during the season about to commence.

Weimar.—The opera season at the Court Theatre commenced on the 18th ult., Herr Kryzanowsky, formerly of Hamburg, being the successor of Herr Stavenhagen in the principal conductorship. Herr Felix Weingartner's "Genesius" is to be brought out at an early date.

Zurich.—A marble commemorative plaque has been placed at the house at Niederbad, on the lake of Zurich, where Johannes Brahms at one time resided.

OBITUARY.

Thomas John Harper.

One after another the members of Costa's famous orchestra follow their chief through the valley of the shadow of death. Not the least distinguished member of that rapidly diminishing band was the trumpeter, Thomas John Harper, who, we regret to record, passed away at his residence, 185, King's Road, Camden Town, on August 27, aged nearly eighty-two years. Born in London on October 4, 1816, he was the son of a still more eminent performer on the trumpet, Thomas Harper. The elder Harper was seized with his fatal illness, terminating on the same day, at a rehearsal of the Harmonic Union (not the Sacred Harmonic Society as a contemporary has it), at Exeter Hall, January 20, 1853. Since then, and until his retirement a few years ago, Thomas Harper, the younger, has been facile princeps of orchestral trumpet players. Between 1830 and 1836 he was a student at the Royal Academy of Music, where he was for many years professor of the trumpet and a Fellow of the Institution. He studied the violin and pianoforte in addition to the trumpet, and for a time he was a violinist in the opera band of Her Majesty's Theatre. But he soon devoted himself entirely to the more ancient instrument, upon which he became a very eminent performer. He was Sergeant Trumpeter to the Queen, and for nearly half-a-century trumpeter to the Lord Mayor. The late Mr. Thomas Harper took a prominent part, in a very literal sense, in many state functions—royal christenings, marriages, opening of exhibitions, visits of foreign sovereigns, &c.—and, of course, many civic functions. But he will best be remembered to old habitués of the Sacred Harmonic concerts by his trumpet obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound," when his smooth, silvery, and unforced tone did much to reconcile one to Handel's too literal treatment of those words. During the preceding chorus, "Even so in Christ," the tall, handsome, black-bearded form of Harper would be seen quietly making his way between the music-desks towards the front of the orchestra. Having arrived there, Costa would turn his stand round, upon which Harper placed his music, and then he would play as a true artist. In like manner he accompanied nearly every prima donna of note in the obbligato to "Let the bright Seraphim," always with fine effect and artistic restraint. Two of Mr. Harper's brothers, both of whom predeceased him, were well known in musical circles—Charles Harper, the first horn in Costa's band, and Edmund Harper, of Belfast, organist to the late Marquis of Downshire, and a leading professor in the Ulster capital.

The death is announced of a well-known American musician, Professor John Comfort Fillmore, who died at his native place, New London, Connecticut, on August 15, aged fifty-five. He made a special study of Indian music and wrote several interesting articles on musical subjects in American journals. Professor Fillmore is best known on this side of the Atlantic by his "History of Pianoforte Music," the English edition of which was edited and Bowdlerised by the editor, the late Ridley Prentice. "With regard to Weber," says the English editor, "our author has been cruelly severe, representing his pianoforte compositions as absolutely worthless. By cutting out some of his remarks, and slightly modifying others, I have brought the estimate of Weber's powers more into accord with the general verdict of musicians." This is all very well. But it would have been much more satisfactory if the author's opinion had been allowed to stand, and if, in addition to his justified protest, the Editor had added his own views in different type, or as an appendix.

Much sympathy will be felt for Lady Hallé in her terrible grief occasioned by the death of her son, Norman Néruda, the result of an Alpine accident, in the Austrian Tyrol, on the 11th ult. Mr. Norman Néruda, who was one of the best rock-climbers of the day, was in the habit of annually spending his holiday at the Karersee Hotel. In descending the "chimney" of the Langkofel, known as the Schmidkamin—the longest and most dangerous piece of rock-climbing in the whole of the Dolomites—a piece of rock on which Mr. Néruda was obliged to hold gave way and precipitated him to the rocks some distance below. The party were compelled to remain there all night, and when, from signals of distress, a relief party arrived in the morning, Mr. Néruda was removed from his perilous position, but he died in the arms of the guide who was carrying him. The funeral took place at the village of St. Ulrich, in the presence of the deceased gentleman's wife and Lady Hallé, his mother.

A painful sensation was caused at Portsmouth, on the 14th ult., by the sudden death of Samuel Round, a well-known local musician, who, we regret to say, expired at his Southsea residence from heart disease. Mr. Round was a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists and formerly assistant-organist at Peterborough Cathedral. At the time of his death he held the appointment of organist of Portsmouth Parish Church, though he had just won a preferment to a similar post at the Parish Church, Birmingham, where he played as the selected candidate on the Sunday previous to his death.

On the 5th ult., at 3, Woburn Terrace, Tavistock, William Beare, late senior partner of Beare and Son, 34, Rathbone Place, aged seventy-six years. Interred in Plymouth Road Cemetery, Tavistock. For nearly forty years he was a well-known figure in the musical instrument trade. He had retired from active business for some time.

Miss Stott, probably the senior chorister of Liverpool, died on August 15. The lady had seen an extraordinary long period of service, as, according to Mr. Argent's "Half a Century of Music in Liverpool," she sang in the old series of festivals in the "thirties," at one of which (in 1836) Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was first performed in England. In 1839 Miss Stott was one of the principals in Handel's Coronation Anthem "The Queen shall rejoice," loyally altered for the occasion, and she was a familiar figure among the choristers of the Philharmonic Society till a period which may be regarded as comparatively recent by the oldest generation of local concert-goers.

Edward Wilberforce, late organist, successively, of St. Francis Xavier's, St. Anthony's, and St. Alexander's Roman Catholic churches in Liverpool, died on the 6th ult. He was a clever musician and son of Charles Wilberforce, one of the oldest orchestral performers of the city on the Mersey.

Belgian musical art has sustained a sensible loss in the death, on the 11th ult., at Ghent, of Adolphe Samuel, for many years director of the Conservatoire in that town. Born at Liège in 1823, he was a pupil at the Liège Conservatoire and also studied at Leipzig under Mendelssohn. He resided at Brussels for a number of years, occupied with teaching and musical criticism, until he was appointed, in 1871, to the directorship of the Ghent Institution, a post which he occupied with much distinction until his death. Amongst his earlier compositions are several operas, symphonies, and chamber works, and he also wrote the cantata performed in connection with the inauguration of the monument erected to Leopold I. at Laeken, in 1880. His most important and valuable works, however, were produced towards the close of his career, chief amongst them being the oratorio or "sacred symphonic poem" "Christus," which met with high appreciation on its repeated performance both in the composer's native country and in German and Austrian concert-rooms, a "Psaume de David," and a Mass which, by his expressed desire, was performed at the funeral obsequies of the deceased artist.

The talented young Neapolitan composer Niccolo van Westerhout, died on August 21, at Naples, at the age of thirty-five. He was a native of Sicily, of Flemish extraction, and made his musical studies at the Naples Conservatorio. He published some important instrumental compositions, amongst them a violin concerto, frequently played by Teresina Tua, and a symphony. His principal operatic works are "Cimbelino" (founded on Shakespeare's drama), "Fortunio," and "Doña Flor."

Jules Lefort, some forty years ago a highly popular drawing-room singer, both in the French capital and in London, died in Paris on the 7th ult., aged seventy-seven. He was the author of a very useful "Méthode de Chant."

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ALGERNON ASHTON AMONG THE TOMBS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the current number of your esteemed journal there is a leaderette on the ill-fated musician, Joseph Augustine Wade, concluding with the following words: "The place of Wade's burial is at present unknown. Can any of our readers supply the information? Has Mr. Algernon Ashton an entry of the name in his Burial Ledger, or Tombstone Journal?" I am sorry to have to inform you that in all my wanderings and explorations of notable tombs I have never come across the resting-place of Joseph Augustine Wade. I do not even know the churchyard where he was buried. As Wade died friendless and penniless, there was most probably no monument erected over his grave, which circumstance would render the discovery of the exact spot all the more difficult. By the way, Joseph Augustine Wade had a son bearing the same Christian names, and who was likewise a musician and composer. Whether he is still alive, I am unable to say, but should this happily be the case (which is quite possible, seeing that the father was born not earlier than 1801), then I should imagine that the son would be the most likely person to know all about his father's burial-place.—Very faithfully yours,

Algernon Ashton.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Dover.—The annual report of the Choral Union states that the following works have been selected for performance during the season: Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Sir F. Bridge's "The Flag of England," and a new cantata, "The Last Supper," by Mr. H. J. Taylor, conductor of the Society.

Gravesend.—The twenty-first season of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association will comprise three concerts: Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" is to be given on November 30, a British Ballad Concert on February 14, and Gounod's "Redemption" on April 19.

Melbourne (Australia).—The monthly meeting of the Musical Society of Victoria was held, on July 30, at Glen's Concert Room, which was well filled. Two pieces were given for the first time at the Society's concerts—namely, the recently published Trio in G major (Op 63) by Hans Sitt, a slight but pleasing work, and Raff's Sonata in D for pianoforte and violin (Op. 128). In the first-named Mr. T. J. Hammond, at the pianoforte, was associated with Miss Ethel Mercer (violin) and Mr. Arthur Montague (violoncello), and in the Sonata with Mr. Franz Schieblich. Mr. Annibale Coy gave excellent performances of Ernst's Elégie and Spanish Dances by Sarasate. Miss Annie Jones contributed an acceptable pianoforte solo, and Miss Alice Coy was very successful in the Jewel Song from "Faust" and Costa's "I will extol Thee," from "Eli."

Newcastle.—The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union announces two concerts, the first of which will take place on December 8, when Handel's "Samson" will be performed. The second concert will include either Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal," Elgar's Leeds cantata "Caractacus," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," or Horatio Parker's "Legend of St. Christopher."

Port Elizabeth (South Africa).—Messrs. Barton and Wilhelmj's second concert was given in the Leidertafel on August 19. Mr. Barton played Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien," Paderewski's "Chant de Voyage" and Polonaise, Chopin's Valse in E flat, Nocturne in D flat, and second Scherzo in E flat minor. Mr. Wilhelmj sang the Cobbler's Song from "The Meistersinger," "Montrose's Love Song" (Maud Valérie White), "Der Rose" (Spohr), and Figaro's air from "The Barber of Seville" (Rossini).

Salford.—Harvest Thanksgiving services were held at St. Simon's Church on the 18th ult. There was a special musical service in the afternoon with an augmented choir. The selections included "O be joyful" (Smart), "Who is this?" (Kent), "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), "O Lord how manifold" (Barnby), &c. The soloists were Miss Flitton, Mr. Orange, and Mr. Mellor. The choir showed the result of careful training. The services reflected great credit on the choirmaster, Mr. Nelson Stokes. Mr. Shorrock rendered efficient service at the organ.

Southsea.—The annual report of the Portsmouth Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. W. E. Churcher, announces some of the principal works to be given during next season. These include Hiller's Symphony (No. 1) in E minor, Gade's Symphony (No. 3) in A minor, and Schumann's (No. 1) in A flat. The list includes several overtures, suites, concertos, &c.; but, with the exception of three of the overtures, English music is not represented.

Sunderland.—The Philharmonic Society will perform Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" with Verdi's "Stabat Mater" on November 16, and Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" with Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" on March 15.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Organist.—The vexed question of the bossiness of a clergyman, who knows absolutely nothing about music, over an organist who thoroughly understands his business, is a difficult one to advise upon, especially when eccentricity forms part of the interfering equipment of the reverend gentleman. The only thing is to pursue a course of courteous firmness, tempered with tact, and to let the good man in holy orders see that, in a quiet manner, you intend to have your own way. You have right and reason on your side, and, if necessary, this should be pointed out to the interferer. If you are thoroughly in earnest, and can induce your vicar to believe that you have the best interests of the musical service at heart, he ought, surely, if he is a reasonable man, to discontinue his erroneous conduct. If he is unreasonable and becomes obstinate, then take the earliest opportunity of getting another appointment. But stick to your principles.

Student.—The Chromatic Fantasia by Thiele should be played chiefly or entirely on the great manual; although, with a little contrivance, especially with regard to the tone of the pedal part and use of pedal to great coupler, the passages in chords may perhaps be taken on the swell, or choir coupled to swell. The stops selected should be bright rather than loud, as great (coupled to swell) with eight and four feet tone; for the latter "the harmonic flute" would be better than the "principal." The full organ should only be used in the closing sentences. Suggested metronome rates: Fantasia, ♩. = 108; Fugue, ♩. = 126. Merkel's Concertstück in E minor, ♩. = 88.

Agricola.—(1) It is rather difficult to satisfactorily answer your arpeggio question in a general way. If you will furnish us with a definite example, we shall be glad to give you an opinion. (2) You might look at Köhler's Easy Studies (Op. 151), Czerny's "Erster Lehrmeister" (Op. 599), and Doring's "Grundpfeiler des Clavierspiels" (Op. 38, Parts 1 and 2). Kunz's "200 Canons" (Op. 14) are most invaluable for reading purposes and rhythmic cultivation. (3) Probably not more than a tone up or down.

M. W.—Your question is a little vague. If by the "Royal Academy Exams." you mean the examination for the Licentiateship, which is the only public examination of the Academy, then as a preliminary thereto you could not do better than send candidates up for the examinations of the Associated Board. There are various degrees of difficulty in these testings, all of which are fully set out in the two syllabuses issued by the Board.

G. J.—We do not know of any book that exactly covers the ground of "Song-writing as an art." You should read the article "Song," in Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," and Sir George's remarks on the Songs of Schubert in the biography of that composer in the same work. A careful study of the best songs would probably serve a better purpose than a treatise on the subject.

B. S.—We will endeavour to find out the information you ask for by next month's issue. We do not think that the appointments are yet all made.

J. D. G.—Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" is issued in four vols., price 21s. each. It is also published in parts. Parts 1 to 14 and 19 to 22, 3s. 6d. each; 15 and 16, 7s.; 17 and 18, 7s.; 23 to 25, with Appendix, 9s. The complete index to the work is 7s. 6d. Messrs. Macmillan and Co., Limited, are the publishers.

Banestra.—Novello's list of operettas furnishes several suitable for adult use. "King Bulbous" and "Prince Ferdinand" are two with parts for adult male voices. No performing fees are charged. Other good operettas of this class are published by Messrs. B. Williams. We do not know whether this firm charges performing fees.

Cantab.—The following metronome rates are suggested: Chopin's Fantasie-Impromptu in C sharp minor, ♩ = 84. Grieg's Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 7), Allegro moderato, ♩ = 100; Andante, ♩ = 76; Alla menuetto, ♩ = 92; Finale, ♩. = 104.

A. B.—The metronome indications of Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2) may be approximated as follows: Allegro con brio, ♩ = 144; Adagio cantabile, ♩ = 48; Scherzo, ♩. = 72; Allegro, ♩ = 144.

Viola Gitana.—We fear that we are unable to give the names of some of the best violin and singing teachers in London and their fees. They would doubtless be willing to give lessons for a short period of three or four weeks.

A. M. F.—There is at present no intention of reprinting in book form the biographical sketches which have recently been appearing in these columns. We are very glad to hear that you appreciate them and find them useful.

Enquirer.—The incomparable "371 vierstimmige Choralgesänge" of J. S. Bach would probably suit your requirements. The work is published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, price 3s.

F. S. J.—We know nothing of the system of voice production to which you refer, and before taking any steps caution is very necessary. We regret that we cannot recommend teachers of singing.

Boehm Flautist.—We are much obliged for your suggestion. If possible we shall endeavour to carry it out as opportunity offers, but it is quite impossible to do so in the present issue.

Red.—The English translation of Helmholtz's "Sensations of Tone" is published by Messrs. Longmans, price 28s.

B. E. K.—Your poem is declined with thanks. We have no use for unsolicited contributions of that kind.

R. P.—The coincidence you send us is not very good. The subject is played out.

A few questions, received too late to be answered this month, are held over.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF THE MUSIC
BY
SIR JOHN STAINER
M.A., Mus. Doc., Oxford; Hon. D.C.L. and Mus. Doc., Durham;
Professor of Music in the University of Oxford.

The manuscript from which these compositions are transcribed is probably one of the most valuable store-houses of early 15th century music in existence. The Editors have selected secular compositions as being less conventional than the Masses of that period, and also more rarely met with. So little music of this early date has been printed that students of musical history have hitherto had little but hearsay to rely on. They will now be able to see works by Dufay, Binchois, Brasart, Frenon, Acourt, and many others, some of whom have up to this time been only known by name. Eight facsimiles are given, to show the style and method of writing music at this time; a subject fully treated in this work.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

SALE BY AUCTION

OF THE WELL-KNOWN AND OLD-ESTABLISHED

MUSIC PUBLISHING, PIANOFORTE, ORGAN, AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENT BUSINESS OF

Messrs. ROBERT COCKS AND CO.,

6, New Burlington Street, W.

In consequence of the intended retirement of the Proprietor, Messrs. PUTTICK AND SIMPSON have been favoured with instructions to offer for Sale by Auction the whole of the above well-known business. The Firm was established in the year 1823 and has always been celebrated for the publication of high-class Standard and Educational Music, and holds Special Warrants as Publishers to Her Majesty the Queen and H.R.H. the Prince of Wales.

It is without doubt the most important business of this nature ever submitted to public auction.

The first division, forming Lot 1, will comprise the Goodwill and right to trade under the name of Robert Cocks and Co., the Lease and Fixtures, and the important Tuning Connection. The purchaser will have the option of taking over the book debts at the amount thereof less a discount of 5 per cent., otherwise they will be collected in the ordinary course by the Vendor.

The second division will consist of the Musical Copyrights and Publications, the Engraved and Stereotype Plates and Litho Title-stones appertaining to the same, and will be lotted from Lot 2 upwards.

In connection with this portion of the Sale it may be stated that the turn-over for the last four years has exceeded £21,000 per annum.

The third division will comprise the entire stock of Musical Instruments, which will be offered in Lots.

The usual terms of credit will be allowed to approved purchasers.

The Sale will take place the last week in October or first week in November.

For further particulars apply to the Auctioneers,

PUTTICK & SIMPSON,

A SONG OF DARKNESS AND LIGHT

BY

ROBERT BRIDGES

SET TO MUSIC FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Price Two Shillings.

THE TIMES.

The music contains a series of masterly tone-pictures, built on themes of the utmost originality, which are easily identified with the successive moods as they pass. . . . The "Toil" chorus, rising to its climax in the praise of God, is in all ways worthy to stand beside the great choruses in "Judith," "Job," and other works of the master's. . . . The most beautiful number of the work, at least on a first hearing, is the chorus which follows next, "Tears." Here the "dews of the heavenly spheres," the tears that are as far from sorrow as from joy, are described in words and music that have never been exceeded in tender beauty or emotional depth. From this mood we are awakened once more by the soprano solo in the phrase "Gird on thy sword, O man," leading to a magnificent chorus, closing with one of those wonderful climaxes of which the composer has given so many to the world. The devotional character which is here kept in view, simultaneously with a culmination of effect that seems almost to exhaust the powers of music, is perhaps the most remarkable feature of a work which we must not hesitate to pronounce sublime, in spite of the reluctance which all Englishmen seem to feel in acknowledging the presence of the highest qualities in a musical composition by a countryman.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Hubert Parry's treatment of the words put into his hands is eminently characteristic of the composer. It offers to us features with which his earlier creations have made us familiar, as, for example, the prominence of a rich and busy orchestra co-ordinate with the vocal music in design and expression, the prevalence of declamatory passages for the voices, whether soli or chorus, and a certain brooding intensity of utterance which seems to indicate great labour, but is really, I suspect, the result of a deeply emotional temperament. . . . Nowhere is the musician who hears it sensible of a blank. Always something interesting stands to the fore, and there are many moments when the art of the music soars towards greatness. Take, for example, the chorus under the head of "Tears." I know little in music more deeply interesting or more tender and pathetic. It is an offering on the altar of human compassion worthy of the divine quality to which its homage is paid.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

A work throughout which the pulsation of human emotion is evident. . . . Sir C. H. Parry has risen to the height of the argument, both the instrumentation and the choral work displaying a reserve of strength upon which apparently a far heavier call than has been needed here might be made successfully. . . . There can be no hesitation in pronouncing this "Song of Darkness and Light" quite worthy of the industrious and popular composer. It has dignity, force, and imagination, besides technical attributes of the highest order.

MORNING POST.

The first section is entitled "Mystery," and it is scarcely necessary to say that it makes great demands on the composer. When, therefore, it is said, as it may be emphatically, that Sir Hubert Parry has allied these lines to music which intensifies their significance, it will be understood that he has ascended to the highest level of his art. He has, indeed, written nothing finer in his most inspired moments than this number, and the lofty nobility and sustained power of the music are magnificent. . . . In this movement we have the style so familiar to those who know Sir Hubert's choral works. The music rushes on with exuberant impetuosity, and the accompaniment seems to goad the voices to greater vivacity. It is followed by an orchestral interlude of great beauty, in which the clarinet is lovingly written for, and prepares the way for the second soprano solo, "Art." . . . At its conclusion the oboe gives out a most expressive theme, which ushers in a section of deep sentiment and great beauty illustrative of "Tears." The music in this portion is exquisitely tender, and it seems to breathe the very spirit of "sweet compassion."

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Sir Hubert Parry's setting, which is laid out for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, may be best described as fine music throughout, rising in several numbers to a plane of noble and touching beauty. The instrumental introduction to the strophes headed "Mystery" is eloquently expressive of awe and uncertainty, and the impression is enhanced by the sombre yet beautiful opening chorus. Next we may notice the soprano solo, "In ways of Beauty and Peace," in which the serenity of the words is happily reflected in the musical phrases, while the chorus of "Toil" is instinct with energy and resolve. By far the most beautiful passage in the work, however, is the setting of the section entitled "Tears," a singularly affecting number, with a lovely closing cadence. The work ends as impressively as it begins, but now the faltering accents of uncertainty have given place to the sonorous tones of confidence.

GUARDIAN.

It must suffice if we single out the "shining moments" of a work of consistently high aim, virile energy, and deep feeling. The sombre but picturesque instrumental introduction is admirably suggestive of the atmosphere of mystery conveyed in the opening lines of the Ode, and the impression is maintained throughout the opening chorus. . . . For the lines on "Toil" Sir Hubert has found the strenuous accents in which his genius excels, while the beautiful stanza, "Tears," is rendered doubly affecting by the tender grace of the choral harmonies. The close of the work, again, is not only splendidly impressive from the volume and richness of its sound, but its spirit is the very sister soul of the spirit of the words.

BALLADE

FOR FULL ORCHESTRA
COMPOSED BY
S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.
(OP. 33)

Arrangement for Pianoforte Solo, 2s.
String Parts, 4s. 6d.
Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is marked by the same strong instinct for beauty of tone-colouring and for characteristic turns of melody that has distinguished his work in more modest surroundings, and it is a most favourable specimen of his powers. The theme, which we should be warranted in naming the second subject, is most fascinating in its naive beauty, and placed as it is in contrast to a strenuous and most original theme of bluff and almost savage character, it is thrown into the best light. The feeling for real effect manifested throughout the work is most remarkable, and it is no wonder that the excellent performance given by the band called forth an exceptionally hearty outburst of enthusiasm.

MORNING POST.

It is a striking work, and it possesses a masterful force and half untamed and fiery exuberance that give it memorable distinctiveness. . . . These two themes and the initial subject are treated with great skill and command of the orchestra, the work in its entirety possessing a life and individuality that fix it in the memory, and increase expectation of what its composer may write in the future.

STANDARD.

The Orchestral Ballad produced for the first time in public to-night is a remarkable and striking work, and possesses in notable degree the peculiar blending of barbaric and Western modes of expression which is so distinguishing a feature of this young composer's efforts. . . . The whole work, indeed, seems to glow with intensity and life, and it holds the attention with relentless grasp. The success of the work to-night was instantaneous.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The work occupies barely a quarter of an hour in performance, but it is long since a Festival novelty has provided fifteen minutes packed so full of excitement and charm. In its alternations of barbaric gaiety with languid swaying melody, in its wayward rhythms and strange exotic harmonies, this remarkable work provokes comparisons with the best work of the Bohemian school, and emerges with credit from the ordeal of comparison.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It has the semi-barbaric force and emphasis characteristic of the Slavonic school, and in the treatment of certain passages recalls the determined manner of Tschaikowsky. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor does wonders with a phrase of a few notes, presenting it in varied forms, but never in such manner as to be difficult of recognition. . . . The instrumentation is brilliant, and the composer never seems at a loss for devices to maintain the interest of his listeners.

ATHENÆUM.

A short composition, yet of such vivid imagination, rich colour, and wise restraint, coupled with youthful boldness, that it is a forecast of a great and brilliant career—if only health and strength continue, and if Mr. Taylor escapes from the many dangers which beset a rising artist. The composer at the close of the performance was received with marked enthusiasm.

O SING UNTO THE LORD

(PSALM XCVIII.)
SET TO MUSIC FOR SOPRANO & BASS SOLI, CHORUS, & ORCHESTRA
BY A. HERBERT BREWER.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The choruses, as may be expected, are largely contrapuntal and well written for the voices, but the most conspicuous feature in the Psalm is the free use of an independent orchestra having its own themes, and exhibiting them from time to time in the course of interludes somewhat more extended than is usual. The strength of the work may largely be found here, and the fact is one of promise as regards the music we may expect from the composer in the future. For other reasons as well as this Mr. Brewer's Psalm may be taken as testimony to the possession of no ordinary ability, and as a very encouraging beginning in the highest walk of his art.

STANDARD.

His setting of the 98th Psalm, written for the present Festival, will certainly increase his reputation as a composer. The jubilant spirit of the text is echoed in the music with emphasis and power, and although the strains are distinctly modern in conception and character, the dignity of English Church music is well preserved. . . . Mr. Brewer's work, in short, is one that excited interest by its earnestness and vivacity, and esteem by reason of its sympathy with the text and its musicianlike qualities.

DAILY NEWS.

Contains some of the best work Mr. Brewer has yet given us, and indeed the entire service, both as to the music and its performance, proved conclusively that the English Church school is by no means in its decadence.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

His score is clear and thoughtful, and shows no trace of undue strain. Alike in its vocal and instrumental features, it is free and spontaneous, which is more than can be said of many of the essays of the younger generation of composers. From the first bar to the last the composition yields proof of Mr. Brewer knowing what he wanted. That he got it is obvious. He did not work in the dark, and kept a reserve of strength to be employed when required. . . . The choral writing is clever, yet not over elaborated, and both the soprano and bass solos are grateful to the executants. . . . To sum up, Mr. Brewer's work is interesting, pleasing, and occasionally powerful. These are recommendations that should lead to the work being performed in a more extensive area.

ATHENÆUM.

The choral writing is scholarly, and there is in addition a certain freshness and life which promise well for the future of the composer, who is at present only thirty-three years of age.

Both songs have a comparatively small compass, of an octave and one note, and should be well within the powers of even moderately accomplished singers who can interpret beautiful music of the highest class."—The Times.

"Not the least significant sign of the healthy progress of musical taste in England is the artistic advance shown in much of the music put forward for home use. It is true that some publishers continue to issue compilations which can only be described as good paper spoilt; and, therefore, presumably there is still a buying public for feeble verses and trite melodic and harmonic progressions. Those firms, however, who strive to minister to artistic progress deserve every encouragement; and accordingly it is with much pleasure that we draw attention to 'Twelve Pianoforte Pieces' by Granville Bantock, issued by Messrs. Forsyth, for they belong to a class that is calculated to develop appreciation of real music. They are severally named 'Rhapsodie,' 'Meditation,' 'Phantasy,' 'Scherzo,' 'Nocturne,' 'Legend,' 'Preghiera,' 'Mazurka,' 'Intermezzo,' 'Serenade,' 'Caprice,' and 'Romance,' titles which are justified in each case by the character of the music. They are short and of moderate difficulty, and are more or less effective. The last-named quality, in great measure, arises from Mr. Bantock's recognition of the necessity of contrast. The advantage of this is very noticeable in the 'Meditation,' which is prevented from degenerating, as frequently the case in such pieces, into mere maudlin sentimentality by an intermediate episode which might be construed as a lively recollection. 'Bright-eyed Fancy' trips with dainty grace in the 'Scherzo,' and there is much poetic charm in the 'Nocturne.' The 'Legend' would form an excellent study for staccato wrist-playing; the 'Mazurka' possesses an alluring grace which savours of the East, and it will not improbably prove to be the most popular of the series, although in this particular it will have a rival in the 'Caprice,' which is an alert and fascinating little piece. In the 'Romance' we have a true 'song without words'—one capable of being made very expressive by pianists who can make their instruments 'sing.' 'Tarantella d'Amore' would seem to be a somewhat paradoxical title, but exception can be taken no farther than the name of Mr. Louis H. Hillier's brilliant pianoforte piece. This is dedicated to Miss Ella Pancera, and it may be recommended to the attention of players who possess nimble fingers. Similar in nature, but much easier to execute, is a 'Saltarello' by Charles Davieson, in which the composer has cleverly suggested the leap from which the dance derives its name. 'Deux Valses,' respectively in A and F sharp minor, by M. Esposito, are pleasing pieces, as are also a 'Polka Eccentrique' and a 'Gavotte Pompadour' by Erik Meyer Helmund, and an 'Allegretto Grazioso' by Norman O'Neill. The same firm have recently published several songs which deserve notice. Mr. Arthur Somervell is never more happy than when his creative talent is aroused by words that call for a setting in the English school of the Elizabethan age; and the music he has allied to Shakespeare's lines 'Take, O take those lips away' admirably reflects the spirit of the text, and is, moreover, grateful to sing. The anonymous words of 'Love's Apology,' also by Mr. Somervell, suggest the same period, and the song may be recommended to baritone vocalists to whom the direct diction of our forefathers appeals. Two songs by Ethel Barns, a clever young violinist, merit praise and the favour of cultured singers. They are respectively entitled 'The Humble Swain' and 'O Tsuri San.' The former is a setting for a baritone voice of some impassioned words by J. Sylvester (1562-1618), and the latter a lament over the untimely death of a Japanese dancer, whose whilom fascinations are recounted to music possessing a dainty quaintness, quite in keeping with the subject of the lyric. The compass of the latter song is within the octave D to D. 'Nature's Lullaby,' by Percy Pitt, is an unpretentious but well-written and melodious song, laid out for a soprano voice; while 'Spring calls to the Flowers,' words by G. Whyte and music by G. Villa, is a bright little ditty, with an effective accompaniment, lying well under the hands. The last-named is also arranged as a duet. The 'Bispham Album' is a collection of ten songs by Schubert and Schumann which have been selected and edited by Mr. David Bispham, and, it may be added, have been sung by him at his recitals. Only two by Schubert are contained in the album, but these are 'An die Musik' ('To Music') and 'Der Zwerg' ('The Dwarf'). These testify to Mr. Bispham's musicianship and conscientiousness as an editor. Breath marks are given whenever a doubt could arise on this important matter, and in the latter song there is pointed out in several places the necessity of change of vocal tone-colour. The same care has been bestowed on Schumann's lyrics, and a welcome feature is found in the excellent English translations which accompany the German text. It should be added that the songs have all been transposed to make them suitable for a baritone voice, but in each case the original key is notified. Music is now recognised as forming an important factor in the pastime and education of children, and the publication of cantatas and part-songs fitted to their abilities, and calculated to engender a love of the art, is to be encouraged. Admirably designed for such worthy purposes is a cantata for treble voices, entitled 'An April Shower,' by Bernard and Arthur Page. The story may be described as 'all about nothing,' but in such cantatas it is the episodes that count, and these in the present instance bring forth songs, duets, and choruses of a bright and amusing character, which are wedded to melodious and appropriately simple strains. 'Lohr's School Songs,' for equal voices in unison, and in two or three parts, present a series which is well conceived and skilfully carried out by composers manifestly in sympathy with the object in view."—Daily Telegraph, August 4, 1898.

"The Virgil Piano School has just completed a course of four months, in which a number of children have been taught strictly according to the principles of the Virgil School, under the control of a committee of experts. The Virgil Method aims at a complete separation of the technical training from the tuition of the purely musical element, the technical exercises being performed on an extraordinarily ingeniously constructed toneless Clavier. Should this principle at the first moment appear doubtful, all objections are victoriously crushed by the brilliant results which the Virgil Piano School showed in the examination. It was particularly astounding to witness how children, who had not touched a key before, and had only practised on the toneless keyboard for four months, now produced at once an unusually even touch on the sounding pianoforte keyboard."—Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger, June 17, 1898.

London Rehearsal.—"Incidentally I may be permitted to note that this new cantata has introduced to us an exceptionally fine dramatic baritone in the person of Mr. Charles Knowles, of whom I have never heard before. He is destined, I should think, to take a high position in his profession, and especially if circumstances should lead him to the opera-stage."—Musical Standard, Oct. 1, 1898.
Leeds Musical Festival ("Caractacus"), Oct. 6, 1898.—"Mr. Charles Knowles doubled the parts of the Bard and Claudius. The former he sang with admirable expression and was not unsuccessful in the latter, though he gave to it a slight touch of truculence that was hardly in keeping with a Roman Emperor."—Yorkshire Post, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles, in a dual rôle, also justified the confidence reposed in him by his dramatic style and vigorous utterance."—Leeds Mercury, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles proved himself possessed of a fine voice in the part of Claudius."—Bradford Observer, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles sang with great declamatory fervour and good vocal quality."—Manchester Guardian, Oct. 6, 1898.
"While as Claudius, the Roman Emperor, Mr. Charles Knowles revealed an exceptionally resonant and powerful voice and good art of delivery."—Scotsman, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles, the Leeds baritone, was completely successful as Claudius and A Bard. He has an excellent voice and sings like an artist."—Birmingham Daily Post, Oct. 6, 1898.
"The music of Claudius was most efficiently sung by Mr. Charles Knowles."—Sheffield Telegraph, Oct. 6, 1898.
"The Bard, whose able representative was Mr. Charles Knowles, a leading singer of the near future. Mr. Knowles, who filled the rôle of Claudius, was again eminently successful."—Sheffield Independent, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles, a local singer, took two of the smaller parts and sang them so well that he should be heard more of. He has a fine voice, a good style, and intelligence beyond the common."—Manchester Courier, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Towards the end Mr. Knowles was singularly good, and will probably make a name for himself."—Birmingham Gazette, Oct. 6, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles doubled the parts of the Bard and Claudius with distinction."—London Morning Post, Oct. 6, 1898.
"A special word must be said for the excellent work done by Mr. Charles Knowles, a baritone who has a fine voice and an exceptionally just idea of musical declamation."—Musical Standard, Oct. 8, 1898.
Birmingham Festival Choral Society ("Faust"), Oct. 13.—"With Mr. Charles Knowles, who took the part of Brander, the case is different. He is a new man, but one who will undoubtedly rise very shortly into the highest rank. He possesses every qualification, and in Mr. Elgar's 'Caractacus,' produced last week at Leeds, created a most favourable impression."—Birmingham Gazette, Oct. 14, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles capitally sang the 'Song of the Rat.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail, Oct. 14, 1898.
Newcastle Town Hall, Oct. 12.—"Mr. Knowles's robust rendering of his contribution brought him enthusiastic applause."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle, Oct. 13, 1898.
Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society.—"In the power and musicianly quality of his baritone voice, Mr. Knowles possesses an advantage which is likely to bring him rapidly to the front. The free and effective style of his singing also enables him to display his fine voice admirably. He gave a fine dramatic interpretation of the prologue from 'Pagliacci,' which, however, loses much of its meaning and effectiveness when dissociated from the opera. His other selection was Pinsuti's somewhat hackneyed 'Queen of the earth.' He did not sing quite as smoothly as might have been desired in this song, but nevertheless gave a good rendering of it, and in response to an encore sang with great power and dramatic fervour in 'Onaway, awake, beloved' (Cowen). 'Of fairy wand had I the power,' from Wallace's 'Maritana,' was charmingly sung by Madame Burgess and Mr. Knowles."—Huddersfield Daily Chronicle, Oct. 19, 1898.

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM.

("FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.")

"Likely to be one of the most valuable weapons which has been added to the armoury of the modern teacher during this century."
Sir Frederick Bridge.

RECENT TESTIMONY.

"I play old pieces infinitely better (without practice) than I used to when working at them."—G. P., London.

"I have done no finger studies of any sort since your instructions came, yet I can play ever so much better."—E., Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O.

"Difficulties which were once almost insurmountable now seem to fall to pieces as I play. The keyboard, which once seemed hard and unyielding, has now become like velvet to my fingers."—D. Parkes, Plymouth.

"Was afraid to play a piece in public. Now I have no fear at all. I play no technical exercises."—H., Mus. Bac.

"To me it has been a veritable godsend."—C. S. Parsonson, Mus. Bac.

"You were quite right in assuming that I was in the habit of playing with a limp arm. I have derived wonderful benefit from your hint on this point."—K., Belfast.

"I had decided to send this piece (Czerny's Toccata) with test passages marked, but on playing it to-day I find the difficulties have almost vanished."—C., L.R.A.M.

"My technique has improved wonderfully—nay, almost incredibly. . . . I never feel the need of them (technical exercises) now; during the last few months I have done nothing of the sort."—C. T. R. Scott, Brussels.

"For lightness of touch I would not take off my hat to anybody. A lady said to me the other day that I must have practised a great deal to procure such a touch, and when I told her I did not practise at all at the keyboard, she looked dumbfounded."—W., F.R.C.O.

"I have found the system of the greatest possible use in teaching the piano, more particularly in the case of adult pupils, to many of whom music is now a delight instead of a toil as formerly. To teachers whose time is so fully occupied that they have no time for practice, Macdonald Smith's system is worth ten times the modest fee which he charges for lessons."—Chas. G. Bryan, Southport.

FREDERIC HYMEN COWEN.

After the Queen herself, no feature of the great Diamond Jubilee Celebration of last year attracted so much attention, or aroused so much enthusiasm, as the Colonial representatives—the Premiers and the troops from Greater Britain beyond the seas. Their presence on that memorable occasion created a feeling of genuine interest in our Colonies, such, perhaps, as has never been known before. As time goes on, and with the introduction, on the approaching Christmas Day, of the Penny Post to most of our distant possessions, the bonds of sympathy that unite the Mother Country with her Colonial offspring will doubtless be greatly strengthened. "But what has all this to do with Mr. Frederic H. Cowen?" the reader may well ask. This question may be answered by another: "Is not Mr. Cowen a Colonial product?" We are apt to think of only the material resources of our Colonies and to ignore their artistic possibilities. But in the subject of this Biographical Sketch we can point to a distinguished artist in music who was born in one of our West Indian Islands. Who would have thought it possible that a native of Jamaica should become one of our representative British musicians? Such, however, is the fact.

Frederic Hymen Cowen was born at Kingston, Jamaica, January 29, 1852. His father was subsequently treasurer to the Italian Opera, Her Majesty's Theatre for many years, and also private secretary to the late Earl of Dudley. The Earl, to the day of his death, always took a warm interest in the son of his private secretary. When he was four years old young Cowen was brought by his parents to England. He showed a strong predilection for music almost from his cradle. His first teacher and one of his earliest friends was the veteran Henry Russell, the composer of "Cheer, boys, cheer," who cheered the boy on with kindly encouragement and practical sympathy.

Master Cowen began to compose before he was six. His earliest printed composition bears the following title:—

The Minna Waltz, composed and dedicated to Henry Russell, Esq., by his little friend six years old, Hyman Frederick Cowen. Ent. Sta. Hall. Price 1/6. London: Leader and Cock, 63, New Bond Street.

This piece, published in 1858, consists of three pages, and energetically begins thus:—

In the following year (1859) Master Cowen again appeared before the public in the capacity of a prodigy composer, as the subjoined review from the Musical World of May 28, 1859, abundantly testifieth:—

"The Pet Polka" and "The Daisy Waltz"—by H. Frederick Cowen (Cocks and Co.)—are as simple as a hammer, which is the more easily understood, on learning from the title-page that their composer is only "seven years old." Let Master Cowen wait till he is fourteen before he again ventures into print. "A Mother's Love"—song from the same tender pen (Cocks and Co.)—is really pretty, and gives much more evidence of promise than the Waltz and Polka. Master Cowen may compose another ballad forthwith.

The above is evidently from the "tender pen"—or, may we say? the "sympathetic nib"—of J. W. Davison, The Times critic and editor of the Musical World. The volumes of the latter journal seem to furnish internal evidence that "J. W. D." occasionally contributed to Punch. At all events, a fortnight after the above review appeared, the columns of our humorous contemporary contained a reference to Master Cowen of a nature distinctly prodigious, not to say pungent. Here it is:—

To Persons fond of Prodigies.

In the way of Prodigies we beg to introduce to the reader the Pet Polka and the Daisy Waltz, both of which are composed by a Master Cowen, who, we are informed, on the authority of the title-page—and title-pages speak the truth just as much as tombstones—is "only seven years of age." This young gentleman must be a prodigy far in advance of his time, and must put old Cocker's nose completely out of joint; for he notably proves, in spite of all the numbers which that elderly gentleman can bring forward to outvote the fact, that seven can make a score! —Punch, June 11, 1859.

"Garibaldi"—an operetta.

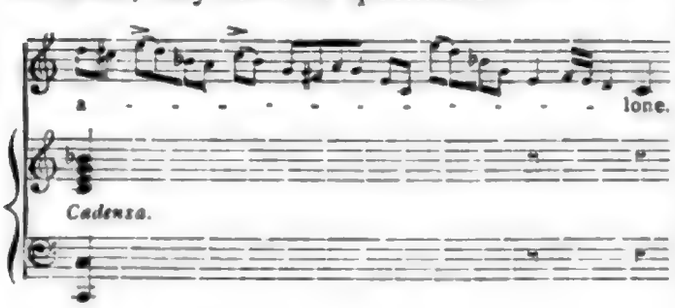
Master Cowen's next attempt in the way of a published composition was a drawing-room operetta. Its title ran:

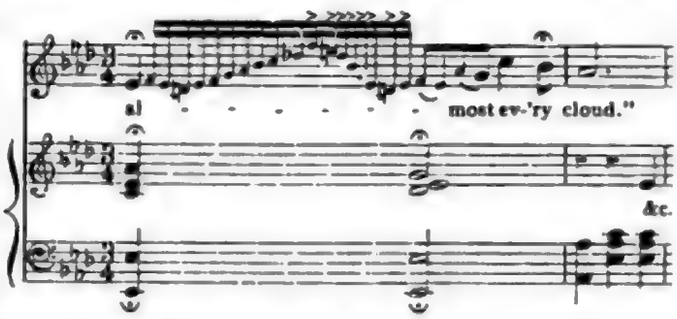
Garibaldi, or The rival patriots: a drawing-room operetta in two acts; the libretto by Rosalind, the music by H. Frederick Cowen.
Ent. Sta. Hall. Author's property. Price [blank].
London: may be had of Boosey & Sons, Holles Street, Cavendish Square.
By kind permission this operetta is respectfully dedicated to the Right Honourable The Earl of Dudley by the youthful composer.

This work was issued in the form of a thin folio volume, very handsomely bound and with gilt edges. The frontispiece consists of a portrait in colours of the "youthful composer" clad in a garb suggestive of the transition period of boys' clothing in regard to the legs, circa 1860. "Kind indulgences" are invoked in the preface for the juvenile composer (aged eight) and also for sweet "Rosalind," the fair librettist, who is stated to be seventeen. The operetta consists of two acts of five scenes each. Garibaldi is represented as making love to Theresa. In order, however, to avoid any sort of shock to the feelings of strict propriety, it is stated that "The authoress is well aware that Garibaldi is married, and has only made use of his name to give more interest to the plot"! The opening song, assigned to Pietro, Garibaldi's aide-de-camp, may serve as an example of the poetry:—

Oh! who can say a soldier's life
Consists of naught but war and strife?
For we have many pleasures, too,
And our duties are but few.

The most astonishing feature of the songs is furnished in the cadenzas, of which the two following, copied with strict accurateness from the score, may serve as specimens:—





"Garibaldi" was duly performed at the "Juvenile Opera House" (!), according to the programme, on February 4, 1860. All the performers, amongst whom were the young composer's sister and brother, were under seventeen: the composer himself, who had just turned eight, presided at the pianoforte. Amongst the audience was Mr. Henry Russell, who presented the composer with a silver cup—now one of the treasures of Mr. Cowen's study—bearing the following inscription:—

H. Fred[k] Cowen | A souvenir of the | performance of his clever opera | "Garibaldi" | from his affectionate friend | Henry Russell | Feby. 4th, 1860.

Benedict and Goss.

In November of the "Garibaldi" year, Frederic Cowen became a pupil of Jules Benedict and John Goss, for pianoforte and harmony respectively. Benedict was very strict. He had a habit of feigning sleep during a portion of the lesson, but he would suddenly arouse when a mistake happened to be made. If Benedict's pianoforte lessons were somewhat dreaded, the harmony lessons with Goss were most delightful experiences. Cowen worked through Goss's harmony, and did much counterpoint and many studies in composition with the former organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. He also studied the organ under Goss and worked at Bach and Mendelssohn on the Cathedral organ.

Goss as a Humorist.

Sir Frederick Bridge has informed us, from the interesting manuscripts in his possession, that Mozart had a distinct vein of humour. Against one of the exercises written by his pupil, Thomas Attwood, Mozart adds the uncomplimentary comment: "You are an ass." Goss was a pupil of Attwood's, and thus, musically speaking, he was Mozart's grandson. What more natural therefore than that, skipping a generation, Goss should inherit the jocosities of the composer of the G minor Symphony? It is very interesting to look through "Master" Cowen's Goss exercise-books and to peruse the letters he received from his witty old teacher. Here are some of Goss's comments: "Too much in a hurry to the tonic." "Make a rondo à la Cowen and a fugue à la Bach." Against an undecipherable correction: "Better remain a mystery." At the beginning of the first movement of a sonata Goss prefixed six words (those in italics) to the young composer's name; by so doing he produced the following trenchant criticism on the boy's attempt: "Written by a remote ancestress of F. H. Cowen." A few extracts from the letters of Goss to Cowen may be quoted:—

Digitized by Google

Dear Youth,
I shall have the honour of looking in on you to-morrow as usual for the Harmony—so don't think to escape your weekly whipping.
Yours truly,
J. Goss.

Dear Hymen,
I want to see you at your own dwelling next Tuesday . . . so wishing you a happy New Year and a handsome moustache,
I am, yours truly,
J. Goss.

Sunday evening,
. . . Recollect, if you please, Master F. H. Cowen!!! you have got my credit to uphold; and if you will only work as you can, will write for me without too much fag, why then we will go on, as heretofore, mixing the Scherzando with the Serioso—if not—Beware!
I'll garotte you!
So no more at present from you know whom!
J. G.

The following epistle shows that Goss's humour could branch off in directions distinctly horticultural:—

25, B[essborough] G[ardens]

Dear Mr. Fredk. H. Cowen,
I will be with you at 3 on Tuesday. Whereabouts is the Tree oh! (as you elegantly style it) to be tried? Is it near Hanover Square? if so, and if I might be allowed to be present—i.e., if I could get the leaves of yourself and friends and of the Tree oh!!—why then I would "speed my bark" that way if I could anyhow contrive to do so.
I should like to taste its fruit.
So no more at present, from
Yours truly,
A Professor of Roots.

BOYISH APPEARANCES.

During this period of pupilage Master Cowen composed several songs. One of these, "My beautiful, my best," set to words by Charles Mackay (who presented the young composer with the copyright), was purchased by a publisher for five guineas—not altogether a bad start for a boy of eleven. In the year 1863 he played to Thalberg, who expressed himself as being very pleased, especially with his compositions. On December 17 he gave a matinée (which we should now call a pianoforte recital) in the Concert-room of Her Majesty's Theatre with marked success, when the leading newspapers spoke in eulogistic terms of the twelve-year-old performer. The pieces played by Master Cowen ranged from Bach to Benedict, all of which, with the exception of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, were played from memory—memory playing not being so common thirty-five years ago as it is now. Six months later (June 15, 1864) he gave another matinée, this time at Dudley House, Park Lane, at which he played Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto; Joachim also played and Santley sang. "The young phenomenon" appeared at Benedict's "grand morning concert"—one of those monster benefits when the programmes usually consisted of about fifty pieces, "enough of music to last them (the audience) for a month to come." At another concert which he gave at Dudley House in the following year (June 22, 1865), a Pianoforte Trio in A of his own composition was performed by himself, Joachim, and Pezze. To this day, whenever he meets Mr. Cowen, Professor Joachim refers to the performance of this juvenile work.

It is quite certain that young Cowen possessed sufficient natural ability to justify his parents in permitting him to follow music as a profession. At that time (1865) the second competition for the Mendelssohn Scholarship (of which Sir Arthur Sullivan was the first scholar) was held. Young Cowen entered for it and carried off this much-coveted prize.

MASTER F. H. COWEN. AGED 13.

But as the Scholarship Committee decreed that the scholar must be placed under their entire control, Mr. Cowen's parents decided that their son should relinquish the honour he had so worthily won. Under these circumstances Mr. (now Dr.) Swinnerton Heap was elected.

LEIPZIG. ORCHESTRATION.

Leipzig was the place decided upon for young Cowen to further pursue his musical studies. In company with his family the former pupil of Goss and Benedict arrived there in October, 1865. He entered the Conservatorium of Leipzig as No. 1,225, and studied under Plaidy, Moscheles, Reinecke, Richter, and Hauptmann. He fully endorses all that Mr. Dannreuther said last month in regard to Hauptmann's snuff-taking propensities. "Here are the very books in which I wrote my exercises," he says; "you can actually smell the snuff to this day." A String Quartet, played at the Conservatorium on January 14, 1866, proved that the young student was making good use of his opportunities. But the Austria-Prussian war cut short his sojourn at Leipzig, and he returned to London. His first appearance as a composer for the orchestra was in an Overture in D minor, performed at Alfred Mellon's Promenade Concerts, Covent Garden Theatre, on September 8, 1866. And here it may be mentioned that Mr. Cowen has never in his life had a lesson in orchestration. All those dainty effects which invest his scores with that characteristic charm peculiar to him are the outcome of natural intuition. The usual concerts took place in the following year (1867): Benedict's—at which he played Bach's Triple Concerto with the Concert-giver and Lindsay Sloper—and his own at Dudley House, when Charles Hallé was his colleague in Mozart's Duet Sonata in D for two pianofortes, and Santley sang a new song by Cowen, "The stars are with the voyagers." The title was somewhat prophetic, as Mr. Cowen has not only been a great traveller, but the stars (even the operatic stars) have ever been kind to him.

BERLIN. CONDUCTING AND ACCOMPANYING.

Thirsting for still further knowledge to equip him thoroughly for his life's work, Cowen went to Berlin in October, 1867. Having entered Stern's Conservatorium, he studied under Kiel. He also had the invaluable advantage — unfortunately denied to the students in our large schools of music—of gaining experience as a conductor, in which difficult branch of the art he has so eminently excelled. Mr. Cowen speaks very strongly, and with just cause, against the neglect of teaching the art of conducting in our Colleges and Academies of Music. The student is made to go through the mill of much grinding work which may, or may not, be of supreme importance to him in his after career; but so important and eminently practical a matter as conducting, as well as that of accompanying, is left to the student to find out and pick up for himself; whereas a regular course of training in both these subjects would be of incalculable benefit to him as a part of his professional equipment.

But to return to Berlin. Mr Cowen played before the Crown Princess of Prussia, now the Empress Frederick of Germany, and spent three evenings with Paul Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, the brother of Felix. A setting of Psalm cxxx. was performed, and after playing at a concert at Leipzig on April 16 (1868) he arrived in London in time to play at one of Henry Leslie's concerts a fortnight later. But we must pass over the numerous concerts at the Philharmonic, Monday Popular Concerts, and elsewhere, at which Mr. Cowen played as a solo pianist during subsequent years. Hitherto he had been chiefly known as a pianoforte virtuoso, but December 9, 1869, not only proved to be a veritable red-letter day to him, but the foreshadowing of still greater things to come. On the evening of that day, in St. James's Hall, Mr. Cowen produced his first symphony (in C minor) and his pianoforte concerto (in A minor). "That occasion was the turning-point in my life," he says. The press were unanimous in their eulogy of the young composer—soon to be eighteen. The notice in the Daily Telegraph, of December 13, 1869, bearing internal evidence of having been written by Mr. Joseph Bennett, may be reprinted:—

> There is balm in Gilead for those who take to heart the cause of national music. The croakers who go about lamenting that we have no composers, and declaring that the English are not a musical nation, may be silenced by a reference to the public performances of the past week. With what right can people be stigmatised as unmusical who have not only crowded, night after night, into the opera-house, but have thronged each day to listen to high-class concerts brimful of interest and novelty? It is idle to assume that mere fashion is the cause of the phenomenon—men and women of intelligence will not consent to and endure the discomfort of Exeter Hall for three hours unless they take genuine delight in what they go to hear. Equally baseless are the Jeremiads uttered about the decay of English genius. It is true that we have had of late years few writers. But great composers must always be rarities, and we have every reason to be satisfied if activity, promise, and ambition are to be discerned among the younger men. For this reason the experience of the past week justifies us in looking hopefully to the future.
> Although we have for some years past recognised the phenomenal talent of Mr. F. H. Cowen as a child-player, and latterly as a clever writer, we looked forward with considerable apprehension to the alarmingly ambitious character of the programme he put forward on Thursday last. A MS. concerto and a MS. symphony by a youth of seventeen, in addition to some smaller works, formed, it must be confessed, a portentous scheme of self-display. But the result justified the boldness of the attempt. The concerto, played of course by Mr. Cowen himself, had many features of interest, but it was quite eclipsed by the more ambitious orchestral work. Here there was not only evidence of musical science, remarkable, indeed, in so young a man, but imagination and originality. The instruments were treated as with a master's hand; while in every orchestral effect was manifest the result of delicate fancy and of careful thought. There was some redundancy in the first movement—an Allegro introduced by a short and impressive Largo—but the beauty of its second theme may well have tempted the composer to recur to it again and again. The Scherzo is deliciously instrumented, while the Allegretto is still more engaging. Mr. Cowen conducted his own work with decision and tact, and, after he had laid down his bâton, he was vehemently recalled. We hope soon to have another opportunity of listening to this really remarkable production. Meanwhile Mr. Cowen had better submit his works to the severest self-criticism. He has it in his power to take his place among the foremost of English musicians.—Daily Telegraph, December 13, 1869.

FESTIVAL WORKS.

For several years Mr. Cowen was accompanist to Mr. Mapleson's concert-party, and in that capacity he visited many provincial towns. He was also assistant-accompanist at Her Majesty's Opera, under Costa, his duty being to play at rehearsals, conduct a chorus behind the scenes, play the organ, and to make himself generally useful in the musical way. He owed his first festival work—"The Corsair," produced at Birmingham in 1876—to Costa's influence. His other festival works have been the "Deluge," an oratorio produced at Mr. Kuhe's Brighton Festival in 1878; "St. Ursula," cantata, Norwich, 1881; "Sleeping Beauty," Birmingham, in 1885, which has been performed over and over again, including a performance at Paris in the French language; "Ruth" (the libretto by Mr. Joseph Bennett), Worcester, 1887; "Water Lily," Norwich, 1893; "The Transfiguration," Gloucester, 1895; and "Ode to the Passions," Leeds, 1898.

THE SCANDINAVIAN SYMPHONY.

Mr. Cowen has composed six symphonies. The first, in C minor, has already been referred to. The others are: No. 2, in F, produced at the Liverpool Philharmonic Society (where Mr. Cowen has always been a favourite) in 1872; No. 3, in C minor (the "Scandinavian"), 1880; No. 4, in B flat minor (the "Welsh"), Philharmonic Society, 1884; No. 5, in F, Cambridge, 1887; No. 6, in E (The Idyllic), Richter Concerts, 1897. The Scandinavian Symphony was produced at one of a series of four concerts given by the composer in St. James's Hall, in the winter of 1880, the actual date of its first performance being December 18. This work gave Mr. Cowen a European and American reputation. The symphony has been performed in nearly every Continental city of importance, as well as in the United States. It may not be without interest to give the "idea" of the symphony in the composer's own words, supplied to the analyst, Mr. Joseph Bennett, as showing the working of a composer's mind in the conception of a "programme" symphony:

The symphony was suggested by my several visits to Scandinavia. The first and last movements may be taken to portray my general impressions—and all the themes have more or less a Northern character about them, the principal theme of the Finale being in fact adapted from an old Norwegian Volkslied.

The Adagio might represent a summer's night (moonlight reverie) on one of those lovely lakes—nights and lakes which can only be seen in the North—the theme for the four horns in the middle might be the sounds of a joyful part-song or students' song wafted across the water and breaking in upon the reverie—and again toward the end of the movement.

The Scherzo might represent winter—a ride in a sleigh—the constant movement of the strings (muted)— being the noiseless gallop of the horses on the snow and the triangle the bells.

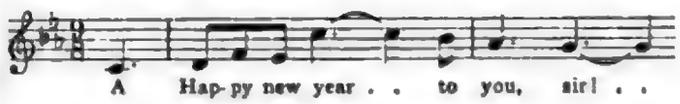
Note, in the first movement, the prevailing minor seventh:

The episode (tremolo) after the double bar might represent the wind moving through those immense gloomy pine forests.

Note again the persisting A flat in the horns just before the return to the principal subject.

Note in the Adagio the theme repeated twice in canon by the basses (second time pizzicato). Note also the modulation into G flat and back to G towards the end of the movement. In the Scherzo, I think the combining of the Scherzo and Trio in the Coda is rather a novelty. Note in the Finale the recurrence of the second theme of the first movement, and of that and the Adagio combined towards the end of the movement, just before the trombones come in.

The Scandinavian Symphony having been produced only a few days before the advent of the new year, the composer greeted Mr. Joseph Bennett, his analyst, with the first section of the initial phrase of the symphony, thus:—



The response came most felicitously and cleverly in the continuation of the phrase:—

From

Jan. 3, 1881. J. Bennett.

OPERAS AND SONGS.

Mr. Cowen has composed four operas: "Pauline," Carl Rosa Company, Lyceum Theatre, 1876; "Thorgrim" (libretto by Mr. Joseph Bennett), Drury Lane, 1890; "Signa," at Milan, 1893; and "Harold" (libretto by Sir Edward Malet), Covent Garden, 1895. For the German Reed Company he wrote, in 1874, an operetta, "One too many," and in 1871 he composed incidental music to the "Maid of Orleans." Mr. Cowen's songs have carried his name throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is difficult, if not impossible, to say how many lyrics he has set to music. He probably does not know himself; but 250 would be well within the mark. Some of his songs—e.g., "The Better Land" (first sung at the Ballad Concerts, St. James's Hall, on November 21, 1877), "The Children's Home," and "The Promise of Life"—have had extraordinary popularity. Many of his lesser known songs—those dainty Schubertian miniatures that he so deftly produces—take high rank as the genuine inspirations of a truly poetic mind. No less remarkable is the rapidity with which he throws off these vocal gems: in five weeks he composed three sets of six songs!

"I think," says Mr. Cowen, "that my best songs are some of those contained in the nine or ten albums I have written, such, for instance, as 'Because,' 'Outcry,' 'To the Night,' 'Adieu,' &c. Of course, these are not so popular with the general public as are many of my ballads, but I have every hope that they may live, long after the ballads are all forgotten."

AS A CONDUCTOR.

No biographical sketch of Mr. Cowen could be considered in the least degree satisfactory if no mention were made of his acknowledged gifts as an orchestral conductor. In the year 1884 he conducted five concerts given by the Philharmonic Society, when he received the congratulations of so distinguished a conductor and pianist as Hans von Bülow. From 1888, on the resignation of Sir Arthur Sullivan, to 1892 he was the permanent conductor of the Philharmonic Society, when he discharged his duties with marked success. In 1888 he accepted an offer to conduct the daily orchestral concerts at the Melbourne Exhibition for six months. He also composed a "Song of Thanksgiving" for the opening ceremony. He received the unprecedented sum of £5,000 for this Antipodean engagement, and he was greeted with genuine enthusiasm.

Two years ago Mr. Cowen was appointed to the conductorship of the Hallé concerts at Manchester, the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, and the Bradford Festival Choral Society. The marked ability with which he has carried out the important duties entrusted to him and with which he has raised the artistic tone and financial results of the concerts are too well known to be enlarged upon here.

PERSONALIA.

The subject of this biographical sketch has been a great traveller. Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Australia, the United States (in 1878), and the Continent of Europe have all been visited by him. He speaks four languages fluently, and has a smattering of several others. He is a great lover of books—one of his hobbies being "first editions," of which he has formed a fine collection. He is not without rhyming propensities. Here is a specimen—a jeu d'esprit—in the form of an invitation to a party on his birthday :—

There's a humble little dwelling not three miles from Charing Cross,
'Tis but five-and-twenty minutes (in a cab with decent horse).

In this dwelling lives a minstrel (or composer, as he's styled),
Who, although he's always Cowin', is both timid, meek, and mild.

. . . . . .

Of kindly sympathising friends, he knows there is no lack,
But he seldom sees their faces, though they often see his back.

Did he not hope to see around his hearth those friends he owns,
And in "common chord" of friendship hear once more their kindly "tones."

Ah! dull is work without some play to ease the weary head;
Life's "rôle" should sometimes cheerful be while earning daily bread.

So, when this minstrel's lines you read, if pity you have got,
Although your leisure hours be few, please come and cheer his lot.

PROFESSOR PROUT AS A POET.

Many of the invited guests, in natural reciprocation, responded to this invitation in strains poetic. The first, second, and last stanzas of Professor Prout's poem of regret at his inability to accept will serve to illustrate the versatility of that distinguished theorist :—

Dear Fred, I must apologise that I have been so long Acknowledging receipt of your most kind and tuneful song.

. . . . . .

Until your letter came, I'd no idea you were a poet,
But one never knows what he can do, until he is put toe it.

. . . . . .

So, regretting that I cannot find the leisure to get out,
Believe me, ever yours sincerely, Ebenezer Prout.

LETTERS FROM HILLER AND HANS VON BÜLOW.

His albums contain many interesting autographs. Two letters from Ferdinand Hiller and Hans von Bülow may be quoted as examples of their command of the English language, epistolarily expressed :

My dear Mr. Cowen,

I answer rather late to your kind letter, but—I was often unwell, I had no photography—and sincerely I knew not what to say about your question concerning "Saint Ursula." Certainly the cantata deserves to be executed—but you have no idea of the number of composers and compositions which are waiting, and waiting a very long time. The execution of your symphony has troubled half a dozen of otherones—a cantata would perhaps despair the dozen entire. After all, as the translation is not a very large affair, at your place I would make it do—though the life is short, the years are long. There is here an other Society, who is always executing new choral works—not badly; but the difference with our band and choir is immense. It would be an introduction—and you would be sure of a good critic in our famous Kölnische Zeitung. What are you doing now? I shall give next week an act of an ancient opera—"The Catacomben," which becomes a novelty for the public here, though it is of my composition!

With the best wishes for the year which begins and for all it's successors,

Very truly yours,

Ferd. Hiller.

Hans von Bülow, who had played under Mr. Cowen's baton at the Philharmonic, wrote:

Dear Sir,

I have just received your kind line of the 13th inst. when I came back from Berlin.

Certainly I shall have great pleasure in playing under your admirable conducting in London again; but I doubt seriously that I would be able to cross the channell again next spring. I am litteraly overburden by business (most for honours sake) the whole winter without any intermission, so that at the end of the season, I will feel so thoroughly exhausted both in brain and hands in order that it might be quite impossible to fulfill with your very valuable wishes. I must think of my health.

Believe me, Dear Sir,

Yours very thankfully,

H. v. Bülow.

Unlike most English musicians, Mr. Cowen has never been a teacher of music. He has always been able to supply his needs entirely by his compositions, his public performances on the pianoforte (in his earlier days), and his conducting engagements. His latest work, a setting of Collins's familiar "Ode to the Passions," for chorus and orchestra, recently produced at the Leeds Festival with unqualified success, has been received with marked favour. The work not only fully upholds its composer's reputation, but it shows a distinct advance upon his previous efforts in the direction of strong choral music. Mr. Cowen is in the prime of life; and his former achievements as an English composer certainly justify the hope that he will continue in the future, as in the past, worthily to maintain the honour of native art in the realm of music.

OXFORD MUSICAL DEGREES.

For upwards of four hundred years the University of Oxford has conferred degrees in the faculty of music. Except in the case of honorary degrees, these distinctions have been obtained after a testing process duly approved by the authorities, but without involving compulsory residence at the University on the part of the candidates. It might naturally be assumed that a system which has stood the test of four centuries in its working would be allowed to continue. But certain members of the University are desirous that the Statutes relating to musical degrees should be so altered by the Hebdomadal Council that no candidate will be able to take a degree in music until he has taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts. This proposal, if adopted, will create a condition of compulsory residence at the University (for a period of three years) before a student can take a degree in music. The practical effect of such a drastic change will be to close the door of Oxford degrees to the musical profession.

One reason—and we must admit that it is a very strong one—given by those who are agitating for the change is that the status of the musician will thereby be raised; that he will be on a level with graduates in other faculties; that he will not be under "a slur," and so on. While fully admitting the importance of raising the status of the musician, it must be borne in mind that you must first get the musician before you can raise his status. Will not the proposed change result in driving away the musical student altogether? What will the University do for talented young musicians without means? What has the University done in the past to promote technical instruction in music? The case of the present distinguished Professor of Music at Oxford serves as a strong reason for the retention of the ancient custom. Sir John Stainer took his degree of Bachelor of Music before he went to Oxford as organist of Magdalen College, and prior to his becoming a resident undergraduate at St. Edmund Hall. There can be no doubt that the degree of Bachelor of Music was a strong point in his favour in getting the important appointment of organist of Magdalen. But what if the proposed new regulations had been in force at that time? With all due respect to the University, it may safely be assumed that Sir John would have fallen upon his feet somewhere, but it is quite probable that he might have been lost to Oxford.

It is no wonder that a matter of so much importance as the proposed new Statutes at Oxford, affecting the ancient privileges of musicians, should have attracted such an amount of attention. At a meeting of the Union of Graduates in Music held at the Royal College of Organists on the 7th ult., under the presidency of Dr. Henry Hiles, this question of privilege was brought forward by Sir Frederick Bridge. It cannot be said that the result was a triumph of the unity of the Union. After Sir Frederick had stated his case against the proposed changes, Mr. W. H. Hadow, a Junior Proctor of the University, and one of the most cultured and distinguished of musical amateurs, took the contrary view in such a speech as might be expected of one possessing high attainments.

One of the best speeches in support of Sir Frederick Bridge's motion was that made by Professor Prout, whose remarks, prompted by a strong sense of justice to the musical profession, were free from personal interest, as the proposed new regulations at Oxford would undoubtedly send many candidates for degrees in music to the University of Dublin. Professor Prout said:—

I may say that I am personally, as regards my own feelings, very cordially in favour of Sir Frederick Bridge's protest, and that I feel with him that there is far more to be said against the proposed alteration than has been said as yet. I have listened with a great deal of interest to Mr. Hadow, but neither he nor anybody else has touched what I consider one of the most important points in this matter. I do not intend to support Sir Frederick's protest, not on the score of my own feelings, but on the score of what I consider expedient, because I do not consider it right for the Union of Graduates in Music to put itself in a position which is likely to place us at a disadvantage. There is one point which I think has been entirely overlooked. Mr. Hadow says this change will raise the value of the degree. Granted that it will; he has overlooked, or, at any rate, he has not met the objection that it will exclude the very class by whom that degree is most wanted, I mean the great body of professional musicians. Why will it exclude them? For the very reason for which I think there should be a difference between the literary standard required for the degree in music and all other degrees. I maintain, as firmly as anybody can do, that we should have a good literary examination before a man can take any degree at all. At my own University there is, I am happy to say, a good stiff literary examination, including two languages, and a good examination in mathematics and history and other subjects, so that we require a man to be a man of good education before he can come on our books at all. And that being the case, I see no reason why the graduate in music should not rank as high as the graduate in any other faculty. They do in our University of Dublin. What, then, is the reason why there should be in common fairness a difference in the amount of literary culture required for the graduate of music as compared with the graduate in medicine, or law, or theology? The difference is just this: a man who is practising law or medicine as his profession does not begin seriously to work at his profession until he is at all events partly through, and in many cases entirely through, his college course.

In the law, for instance, I do not mean that a man does not pick up any preliminary legal knowledge before he leaves college, but he cannot actually enter on the practice of his profession. The great majority of musicians begin their professional career actually during their boyhood—at least a very large majority of those who attain to eminence in any branch of music. Of those of us here who are professional musicians, the greater number have worked at music from our boyhood, and in a large number of cases had to earn our living at the time when we should have had to enter for college.

If this proposal is carried, it will practically shut out the musical profession as a whole, not so much, as Mr. Woods says, merely on account of the want of means—that was met by the statement that at Selwyn and other places one could live on a very moderate amount—but they had not got the time to give two or three years to college when they ought to be earning their living and beginning to work at their profession. For that reason I think the change is decidedly harmful, and in the circular which was sent to me by Mr. Hadow and several others, I expressed the views which I very strongly hold. All the same, I am speaking against the proposal; if I were speaking simply from a selfish point of view, I should warmly support it. I see that a great many men who would otherwise go to Oxford will come to Dublin. Therefore I am arguing, so to speak, against the interests of my own University. I am simply speaking quite unselfishly, when I say that the musical profession will be mainly shut out from the Oxford degree, and obliged to go elsewhere.

This puts the case, so far as it affects the musical profession, in a nutshell. Not only do we fully endorse the remarks so trenchantly expressed by Professor Prout, but we are very glad, though by no means surprised, to learn that Sir John Stainer—one of Oxford's worthiest sons—holds a similar opinion. This is a matter affecting an ancient right of the musical profession, and we have no hesitation in entering a vigorous protest against the sweeping changes proposed to be made in regard to musical degrees in the University of Oxford.

MENDELSSOHN'S SONGS WITHOUT WORDS.*

"As for the 'Lieder ohne Worte,' I wish you would send them to many millions of amateurs and let them play it [them]." Thus wrote Mendelssohn, in English and evidently in fun, to his publisher in London more than fifty years ago. Had the composer been permitted to "draw his breath" for a period corresponding to the Psalmist's length of days, he would in a large measure have experienced the realisation of his desire. The Songs without Words have so long occupied a place in the affections of players on the household instrument that they have literally become household words in a musical sense. There is no need to adjectivise their merits—they speak for themselves in a language that is at once direct, refined, and perfectly understandable. But it may not be without interest to quote the opinion of one of the accredited and most experienced "advanced" musicians of the present day upon these familiar pianoforte pieces. He says:

"The contents of these lyric effusions of the master are invariably pleasing, graceful, and noble—indeed, at times, passionate and brilliant; the form is always satisfactory, concise, and skilful, and their style as pianoforte pieces is excellent and thoroughly adapted to the instrument. Therefore, the study of these Songs, the technical difficulties of which are in places really considerable, will always continue to be of great educational advantage, both mentally and physically, and, amidst the wild tumult of the concerts of the day, a calm enjoyment to all lovers of good music."

Could any higher tribute be paid to a work of art, even if it were a composition by Brahms or Tschaïkowsky? Some readers may be rubbing their eyes and saying to themselves: "This must have been written by that Mendelssohn-mad J. W. Davison half-a-century ago," were it not the fact that it is the definitely expressed opinion of so acknowledged an authority as Karl Klindworth, the pupil of Liszt and the friend of Wagner, and who, in the maturity of his years, is the editor of the volume of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte" now before us.

* "Lieder ohne Worte" for the pianoforte. Composed by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Edited by Karl Klindworth. (Novello and Company, Limited.)

The question may perhaps be asked: "Why a new edition of the 'Songs without Words'? These editor-fellows work with tinkers' tools, they are not to be trusted; away with them!" We are quite ready to admit that there are editors and editors. In regard to some musical publications it might charitably be assumed that the gentleman who is responsible for their editing (so-called) discharges his editorial functions (such as they are) during those periods of leisure snatched from the less responsible duties of the office-boy. Anyone who expects to find traces of this kind of editing in the present publication will, however, be disappointed.

This is a practical age, and anyone who comes forward as a demonstrator of practicability is a public benefactor. This is exactly the position that Professor Klindworth has taken in editing the work now under consideration. First, however, and in order to satisfy those croakers who may rashly assume that the editor has played "ducks and drakes" with the composer's original text, we may quote Professor Klindworth's remarks upon this part of his achievement, in order to show with what artistic reverence he has treated Mendelssohn's music. He says:

"No corrections of any serious importance have been found necessary. Mendelssohn, who was a master of his art and fastidiously correct in the progression of parts and in regard to harmonies, thoroughly understood how to write clearly and euphoniously for the pianoforte. It is only in those cases where a misprint, or a slip of the pen in the manuscript, appears to me to have been made that I have drawn attention to this in my Explanatory Notes; everyone, therefore, according to his own judgment, can either accept or reject my view of the matter."

Can anything be more satisfactory? Such a frank expression of the Editor's method of working at once inspires confidence and commands respect.

But to return to the question of practicability, which, we take it, is the chief raison d'être of this new edition. The important art of phrasing in music receives much more attention now than it formerly did. Composers themselves in their manuscripts frequently gave evidence that they had scarcely considered the matter of slurs in their practical bearing on the interpretation of their works. (They are not above reproach in this respect even in the present day.) In fact, from the indiscriminate manner in which slurs were placed, or more often misplaced, it would seem as if they left that matter to the natural intuition of the engraver—when, perhaps, engravers were not so intelligent as they are nowadays—with the result that this gentleman of the workshop embraced every opportunity of executing some of his most artistic flourishes quite regardless of their effect upon the proper performance of the music. Let us furnish an example taken from Professor Klindworth's Preface. "Wherever it seemed desirable," he reverently says, "for the better understanding of the composer's intentions, I have added phrasing-slurs, which extend the short bar-sections into melodic phrases. A comparison of the opening of No. 14 in the old with that of the present edition will serve to illustrate my method of procedure." Here is the example:—

No. 14.

Old Edition.

New Edition.

This "method of procedure" has been followed by Professor Klindworth with scrupulous care throughout the entire work. The enormous advantage arising from having these phrasing-slurs properly placed cannot be overestimated from the point of view of an intelligent and, more especially, of a poetical interpretation of these lyric effusions.

Before giving some further examples in music type of the Editor's erudition and artistic insight, we may refer to one or two other points mentioned in the Preface. Many marks of expression, which, doubtless owing to carelessness on the part of the original engravers, were inserted in misleading places have been reinstated. No one can find any fault with that. Teachers will hail with satisfaction the announcement that the Professor has given a careful and minute fingering throughout. This will be a veritable boon to those who instruct as well as to those who receive instruction. Moreover, the fingering, we are glad to say, that has been adopted is 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, known as "foreign fingering," though it is really good old English. It was in use in England as far back as 1599, and lasted nearly 160 years, the change to the +, 1, 2, 3, 4 probably being the work of German musicians who migrated to this country during the last century, as they do in the present day.

The use of the pedal has also been very carefully indicated throughout the work. Metronome rates have also been given to each Song; and in this connection the Professor's words of wisdom against the excessive speed characteristic of much of present-day pianoforte playing come with timely warning. He says: "The principal thing is to render the melody expressively, according to its bright or passionate sentiment—in fact, to interpret the soul of the composition." Would that these words could be indelibly written upon the mind of every student—Soul-playing to take the precedence of manipulative skill.

It is due to Professor Klindworth to say, without reserve, that he has discharged his editorial duties with conspicuous ability. He brought to his task splendid credentials as the editor par excellence of Chopin. "I maintain," says Hans von Bülow, "that Klindworth's is the only masterly edition of Chopin." We have no hesitation in applying these words to this edition of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words. No higher praise could be given.

A few examples—comparing the present and the old editions — will suffice to show the microscopic thoroughness characterising Professor Klindworth's editorial operations.

The notation of the first two bars of No. 1 may, at first sight, appear strange. We give them in the old and new editions :—

But the dual advantage of keeping the left hand tranquilised in one position, and of giving full opportunity for the bass minims to be brought out with good, sustained, cello-like tone, are obvious.

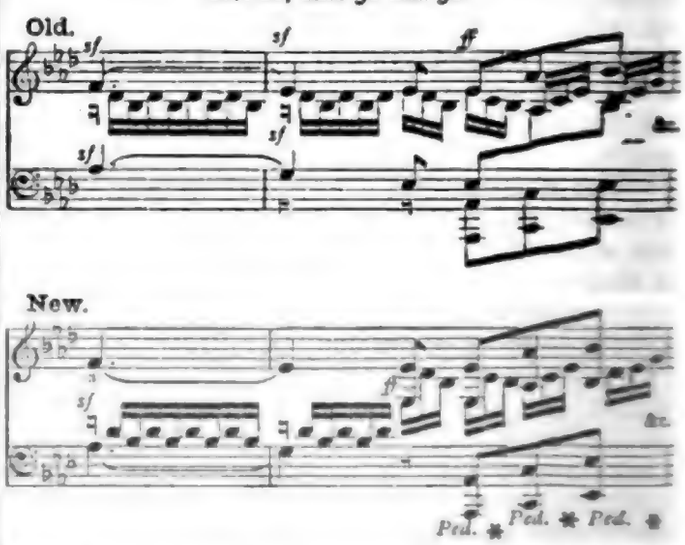
Many instances could be given of the great help afforded to the player by the proper distribution of the accompaniment-figures between the two hands, and in their respective staves. Here are two comparative examples :—

No. 5, bar 30.

No. 10, bars 3 and 4

Again, in the familiar Duetto (No. 18), compare the old form with the new at the return of the main theme in octaves—

No. 18, bars 31 and 32.



and also the concluding bars of the Duetto—

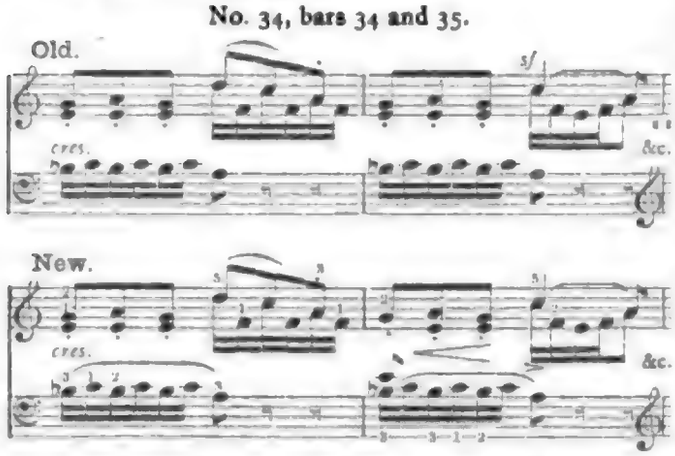
Can anyone doubt the immense gain to the performer which such practical assistance affords?

Another, though more subtle, touch of the skilled master-hand is evidenced in the Song in

Digitized by Google

C, often, though unauthoritatively, designated "The bee's wedding":—

No. 34, bars 34 and 35.



The form in which the passage is printed removes any risk of breaking its merry skittishness, by assigning the first E in bar 35 to the left hand. But even here the Professor is not dogmatic, as less competent editors often are. He says in his valuable "Explanatory Notes": "The E may be played with the right hand. Nevertheless, I consider the form in which I have given it to be the easier method." Countless other examples—in fact, they are to be found on every page, if not in every bar—could be adduced to prove, if, indeed, proof were necessary, that such editing as this is not in the least degree a perfunctory business. Professor Klindworth says: "I have endeavoured to make it [this new edition] instructive." No one who carefully looks into the detailed excellence of his editorial insight and ripe musicianship, so ably demonstrated in these Songs, will deny that he has entirely succeeded.

The general appearance and get-up of the volume calls for the highest praise. In the first place, the music is not in the least degree crowded. As a matter of fact, the volume now under review contains twenty-eight more pages than does a German edition (including all the eight books) of the same size. Therefore it is obvious that a great advantage from the reading point of view is secured by having the music so well spaced and made comfortable to the eye. The engraving of the book is an artistic piece of work reflecting the greatest credit upon the head of Messrs. Novello's engraving staff, who, we believe, has engraved much of the work with his own hands, and every page of it has received the advantage of his personal supervision. Not only has the minutest detail been considered from a purely technical point of view in regard to engraving per se, but such an apparently small matter (to a mere hack-work engraver) as good "turns over"—though of immense advantage to the player—has been carefully considered in setting out the work. In fact, from the distinguished editor downwards, no pains have been spared, no trouble has been shirked in order to make this edition as near perfection as it is possible to make it. The paper and printing of the book are included in this appreciation of its all-round excellence and attractiveness.

It only remains to mention, by way of completeness, another feature of the publication that may be of interest to those who play as well as perhaps to those who only listen to these lyric effusions—we refer to the two pages of Historical Notes which follow Professor Klindworth's Preface and Explanatory Notes.

The publication of this new edition marks an era in the history of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words—those "pleasing, graceful, and noble" pianoforte pieces which, as in the past, will, we feel sure, in the future afford "a calm enjoyment to all lovers of good music."

CONDUCTORS—NATIVE or FOREIGN?

Two questions have considerably agitated the musical world during the past month; to one of these—that relating to the Oxford musical degrees—we refer in another column. The other—the conductorship of the Hallé concerts at Manchester—is of hardly less importance, viewed from the standpoint of native musicianship. The pros and cons of the question have been vigorously discussed, and discord has reigned supreme amongst the votaries of harmony in Cottonopolis. At the time of writing the matter in dispute had not been decided; but the facts of the case are so fresh in the public mind that there is no need to enlarge upon the mere incidents of the controversy.

A year after the death of Sir Charles Hallé, Mr. Frederic H. Cowen was (in 1896) appointed conductor of the celebrated concerts so long identified with the deceased musician's name. Mr. Cowen's engagement, however, was from year to year. Such a condition was prima facie not a very satisfactory one; at all events, it was not altogether suggestive of permanence. Moreover, at Sir Charles Hallé's death Dr. Hans Richter was approached with a view to securing his invaluable services to fill the vacant post; but the engagements of the great Viennese conductor precluded him from exchanging the bright and animated life of the city on the Danube for the grimy atmosphere of Manchester. But it now appears that the term "year to year," as applied to Mr. Cowen's engagement, was another form of "keeping the place warm" for Dr. Richter. The German colony in Manchester have a strong influence in matters musical, and as soon as there appeared any possibility of Dr. Richter being free of his Vienna appointments, negotiations were again opened with him; the result is now well known. While within their legal rights in the treatment they have meted out to Mr. Cowen—who has done his work splendidly and with marked success—the "powers that be" in Manchester cannot be said to have shown the consideration that might have been expected to one who has served them so well.

Feeling has naturally run very high in Manchester and its vicinity, and those who have followed the discussion in the local press can form some idea of the Handel-Buononcini controversy of nearly two hundred years ago. We have no intention of considering this question from the Tweedle-dum versus Tweedle-dee point of view. Mr. F. H. Cowen—whose biography, strangely enough, though quite unpremeditatedly, appears in our present issue—needs no eulogy: his abilities as a conductor have been frequently recognised in these columns, and no one will deny that he is a man of marked ability in a sphere requiring many combinative qualities. Then in regard to Hans Richter. Would it not be absurd to say one word derogatory to his pre-eminence as the greatest living conductor? For upwards of twenty years he has been a frequent visitor to these shores and we have come to look upon him almost as one of ourselves. Nevertheless, we do not want our orchestral conductorships to fall entirely into the hands of foreigners. And this leads us to consider the question of an English versus a foreign conductor from a higher plane than that of personal considerations and those petty jealousies, which, unfortunately, so often blemish the professional musical life of this country.

The particular location of the incident above referred to prompts us first to call attention to a feature of our musical life that has become a national heritage—we refer to choral music. In no part of the kingdom are the traditions of choral singing more gloriously upheld than in Lancashire and Yorkshire. Is there any danger of this characteristic possession being ousted from its paramount position? We can well imagine 10,000 voices from the hills and dales of the great manufacturing counties responding with an emphatic and overwhelming "No." But there are indications that great watchfulness will be necessary to stem any current that may loosen that position. At Glasgow, for instance, where Mr. (or Herr) Wilhelm Bruch is the conductor of the "Choral and Orchestral Union" (should it not be "Orchestral and Choral?"), only four concerts out of thirteen are choral; the remaining nine are entirely orchestral, and these are exclusive of "twelve popular orchestral concerts" on Saturday evenings. Moreover (excluding a performance of "The Messiah"), British music is represented at the remaining twelve concerts by how many examples of native art?—with humiliation we write it—by exactly four compositions! Is this a healthy sign of the progress of native art in this country?

To return to the question of the conductor. Cannot we raise the article on our own soil? Are we always to import it? In regard to music, does the great British Public still cling to the old idea that a foreigner is superior to an Englishman? Another question may be asked: Is our national temperament unproductive of those qualities necessary to the making of a good conductor? Can we be charged with being too superficial in our work?

Again: What becomes of our boasted progress in music if important appointments like those of Manchester and Glasgow are not to be filled by native musicians? Would such a stigma be tolerated in any other European country? This is a grave matter and one that calls for very serious consideration. If native conductors do not exist (in sufficient quantities), where is the fault? It would be interesting to know if any means are taken at the Royal Academy of Music, at the Royal College of Music, and other training schools, to instruct students in the art of conducting. No pains seem to be spared in turning out composers and performers—with more or less success, be it observed; but how much attention is given to such indispensable qualifications in a professional musician as (1) the art of teaching, (2) the art of accompanying, (3) the art of conducting? Let our great schools look to this!

We trust that the above remarks may be the means of inducing our readers to think seriously upon the important questions we have endeavoured to raise. Finally, it will ever be the policy of The Musical Times strenuously to uphold native art and to promote its influence and welfare.

The following genuine appreciation of Mr. Edward Dannreuther by his old pupil, Sir Hubert Parry, unfortunately arrived too late to be included in the Biographical Sketch of the former in our last issue. Its tardy appearance, however, will by no means lessen its value or interest. Sir Hubert Parry says:—

"The most completely original and independent minded man it is possible to find, and the most absolutely sincere. Conventions of all sorts seem to pass him by as if they did not exist. Whatever the subject, he seems to look into the heart of it and lay hold of the core of it for himself, and with his own grip. It does not matter what anyone else seems to think about it, if their thinking does not seem to him to have been done whole-heartedly. If the whole world said something was one way, and it seemed to him another, the noise of the many herding together after futility would be as nothing to him. And this independence and native decisiveness of judgment is one of the things that makes his influence upon his fortunate pupils so great. But by no means that alone. For he is one of the most sympathetic and kindly of human beings. Though he lives so much alone, constantly unravelling something that interests him, when he does come out of his solitariness and mixes with his fellowmen, he is genial and responsive to the uttermost; full of enjoyment of humour and bursting into veritable explosions of merriment or pleasure over anything really funny or essentially good and enjoyable. His wide sympathies welcome all imaginable subjects—literary, philosophical, and social, as well as artistic, and his pupils feel as if they expanded under the influence of something much more vital and inspiring than the utmost learning and wisdom of a mere specialist. Moreover, he gives himself ungrudgingly, and often worries himself by his unsparing generosity in helping and sympathising with anyone who will be the better for help and sympathy.

"One of his most surprising gifts is in the direction of flower growing. His little yard of a garden at the house in which he used to live in Orme Square was all ablaze in early summer like one of Alma Tadema's garden corners in an ancient Roman villa. The irises of every imaginable kind and hosts of lilies and fritillaries jostled one another in indescribable profusion. How they were persuaded to grow in such a fashion in London is a veritable mystery. The flowers seemed bound to thrive when he looked after them, as his pupils are bound to expand and grow full of light and insight. It is no wonder he inspires devotion. The veriest trifler in fashionable society would wake up in very shame if he came across such single-hearted genuineness, and feel the better for it too."

Mr. Dannreuther writes in reference to the aforesaid article:—

"Anent the reading of 'Parsifal' (p. 652), there is an oversight—'modulation,' not 'moderation'—for which latter R. W. was by no means remarkable! Please add at the foot of p. 652, col. 2: 'Most of the songs of Berlioz and Liszt, and Cornelius, and all of Wagner's were sung by Miss Anna Williams.' I am sorry that I forgot to mention her kind assistance."

Church music does not seem to have received so much attention at the meetings of the Church Congress during recent years as formerly. The Congress has now been in existence thirty-seven years, having been started in 1861. It may not be without interest to give, in tabulated form, the dates and places at which Church music had recognition, together with some of the names of those who contributed papers on the subject. (There were no papers read at the first two Congresses, 1861 and 1862.)

1863. Manchester: Sir F. Ouseley.
1864. Bristol: Dr. John Hullah and Rev. L. G. Hayne.
1865. Norwich: Rev. J. B. Dykes.
1866 York: Sir Roundell Palmer.
1867. Wolverhampton: Sir F. Ouseley.
1868. Dublin: Sir R. Stewart.
1871. Nottingham: Rev. J. B. Dykes and Dr. Gauntlett.
1872. Leeds: Sir F. Ouseley and Sir J. Stainer.
1873. Bath: Sir J. Barnby.
1874. Brighton: Sir F. Ouseley and Sir J. Stainer.
1875. Stoke-on-Trent: Rev. J. Ellerton and Dr. E. J. Hopkins.
1879. Swansea: Rev. T. Helmore and Rev. W. Pulling.
1881. Newcastle-on-Tyne: Dr. W. H. Monk.
1884. Carlisle: Mr. W. H. Gladstone and Sir W. Parratt.
1886. Wakefield: Sir W. Parratt and Mr. E. Griffith.
1891. Rhyl: Rev. Owen Jones (Welsh Church music).
1894. Exeter: Sir J. Stainer.
1895. Norwich: Dr. Armes.
1898. Bradford: Sir W. Parratt and Dr. Percy Buck.

Whose fault is it that the subject of Church music has been allowed to suffer such comparative neglect? Is it on the part of the organisers of the Congress? Whatever may be said of the amateur musical parson, such devoted men as Ouseley and Dykes were thoroughly in earnest, and took an interest in the music of the Church which seems to have been lacking in the Church Congresses of the last twenty years.

Congratulation was the predominant note at the final meeting of the stewards of the recent Gloucester Musical Festival, at which the Very Rev. the Dean (Dr. Spence) presided. The financial result was most satisfactory. The report stated that the receipts for the performance of "Elijah" (£1,022) were the largest that had ever been taken, and the attendance at that oratorio was the greatest ever known at the Three Choir Festivals. Sir Hubert Parry, who was present in the capacity of a Gloucestershire magnate—he being a squire and J.P. of the county—paid a very high tribute to the admirable qualities, including "gentleness, consideration, modesty, and everything else," shown by Mr. Herbert Brewer, the Cathedral organist, as conductor of the festival. In replying to a vote of thanks to the various composers who had contributed new works, Sir Hubert Parry said that he was only too delighted if he could serve his old county. He felt a most intense interest in Gloucestershire, not only as regards musical matters, but cricket! When he got his newspaper in the morning, the very first thing he looked for was to see how the Gloucestershire team had been going on. The genial Director of the Royal College of Music evidently believes in runs and catches other than musical.

A red-letter day in the musical history of Lincoln Cathedral is in prospect on Thursday, the 17th inst., when the new organ, built at a cost of over £4,000 by Messrs. Henry Willis and Sons, will be opened with a special choral service. The choir will be strengthened by the Cathedral choirs of Ely, Peterborough, and Southwell; by members of the choirs of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, and St. John the Evangelist, Wilton Road (London); and by members of the Lincoln Musical Society, making a total of about 150 voices. Dr. Haydn Keeton, organist of Peterborough Cathedral, will accompany the service, and Dr. George J. Bennett, organist of Lincoln, will conduct. Sir Walter Parratt is announced to give two recitals on the new instrument—one in the afternoon and another in the evening; and the Dean of Norwich will preach. The music will include: "How lovely is Thy dwelling-place" (Brahms), "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks" (without accompaniment), and Dr. G. J. Bennett's Service in A, revised by him for the occasion. We hope to give a full report of this interesting event by "Our Special Correspondent," who will visit Lincoln for this purpose.

The Temple Church has for more than half-a-century been the stronghold of English Church music. We give, from the official list courteously sent to us, the services and anthems appointed to be sung at the Temple Church during the past month:—

Services.—Smart in F (throughout); Sullivan in D (morning); Goss in E (evening); Wesley in F (throughout); Stainer in A (throughout); Garrett in D (throughout).

Anthems.—"Blessed be the God and Father" (Wesley); "Immanuel, beloved Name!" &c. (Bach); "The Lord hath done great things" (Smart); "Judge me, O God" (Mendelssohn); "Behold, all flesh is as grass" (Brahms); "Ye now are sorrowful" (Brahms); "Hear my prayer" (Kent); "Turn Thy face from my sins" (Sullivan); "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" (Farrant); "Remember now Thy creator" (Sterndale Bennett).

The Bach anthem was a selection (Nos. 38 and 36) from the "Christmas" Oratorio, and those by Brahms, sung at the morning and evening services on the 16th ult., were taken from the German master's German Requiem.

"What is the musical profession coming to?" is the pathetic interrogation of an aggrieved organist. He writes: "The wife of a curate at a church—where he receives £140 a year for three services on Sunday and baptisms on Wednesday evenings—is actually giving music lessons at sixpence a lesson of forty minutes' duration, ten minutes of which are allowed for 'settling down,' as she terms it! At the church in question there is a professional organist, but of course he does not receive the stipend of anything like £140 per annum." Here is the clergyman's wife in a new rôle—taking the bread out of the organist's mouth. The spouse of the aforesaid reverend gentleman may or may not be actuated by philanthropic motives in her sixpenny emoluments, while her consort is evidently passing (or parson) rich with exactly one hundred pounds above that annually received by Oliver Goldsmith's village preacher. The ten minutes' allowance for "settling down" is an apparently aggravated symptom of the case. We may be wrong in our diagnosis, but in all probability it is a suppressed form of "payment in advance"—the "settling down" being not unconnected with "settling up."

A very curious and interesting letter addressed by Wagner to Messrs. Schott, of Mayence, in 1832, has just been made public by Dr. Strecker, the present head of the firm. In the preceding year the composer, then eighteen years of age, had offered them a pianoforte arrangement of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which, however, had been declined. With characteristic perseverance young Wagner returns to the charge in the letter in question, of which the following is a translation:—

Leipzig, June 15, 1832.

Dear Sir,—I send you herewith a transcription for pianoforte à deux mains of the Symphony No. 9, by Beethoven, which has been already submitted to you last year, but which you returned, as you were then oversupplied with manuscripts. I now offer it to you again, leaving the same entirely at your disposal.

I do not ask for any remuneration for this work, but if, in return, you will let me have a few pieces of music, I shall feel much obliged. May I request you then to forward me, in exchange, through Mr. Wilhelm Haertel: 1. Beethoven, Missa Solemnis (D minor), score and arrangement for pianoforte; 2. Beethoven, Symphony (No. 9), score; 3. Beethoven, two quartets, score; and 4. Beethoven's Symphonies, arranged for pianoforte by Hummel?

By granting this request, as soon as possible, you will infinitely oblige,—Your most humble servant,

Richard Wagner.

There is something deliciously naïve in the self-confident tone assumed by the perfectly unknown young musician, at that time, as well as in the request made, in return for the disposal of a manuscript previously rejected. The fact, too, of all the music applied for being by Beethoven is significant. It is pleasant to add that Messrs. Schott complied with the request contained in the letter, while retaining the transcription of the Symphony, which, however, was never published. Forty years later it was returned once more to Wagner, by way of a graceful compliment on the part of the eminent Mayence firm. It forms not the least interesting feature in the archives of the villa "Wahnfried."

A grand competitive musical festival, evidently of a Welsh Eisteddfod character, is announced to be given in Queen's Hall on the 24th inst. Prizes are offered for successful competitors in Rhyddiaeth, Barddoniaeth, Cerddoriaeth, Cyfieithiad, Adroddiad, and other equally interesting subjects. The honorary secretary (Ysgrifenydd Myg.) is Mr. J. Edward Davis (Clwydian), 309, King's Road, S.W. The prizes ought certainly to be distributed by a D.D.

The announcement of the impending retirement of Mr. Edward Lloyd from professional life has been received with widespread regret. The great tenor has worthily gained the esteem of the British public, and, at the same time, he has upheld the best traditions of English vocal art in a manner calling for unstinted praise. We hope in the near future to give a Biographical Sketch of Mr. Lloyd. In the meantime, we may refer to the fact that no Academy, College—not even a University—can claim him as one of its alumni. Moreover, with the exception of the ordinary choir boy training, received during his choristership at Westminster Abbey from James Turle, he has been entirely self-taught. Not only has he been able to get along very comfortably without the aid of the expert voice trainer, but he has mercifully escaped the snares of the voice strainer. As his retirement will not take place until the year 1900, there will doubtless be found many opportunities of hearing our great tenor before he settles down to the life of an English country gentleman. That all such opportunities will be embraced to the full goes without saying. The World—somewhat too previously, perhaps—chants a farewell in the following strain:—

Oh, sweet-toned singer, man of notes,
Whose voice has charmed us many a day,
Where shall we find in other throats
The "even tenor of your way"?

As from the platform you depart
(To leave, alas! how vast a void),
Farewell, we say, with heavy heart,
And a regret that's un*alloy'd*.

Many English friends and pupils of Professor Klindworth will doubtless be interested in the following extract relating to him, translated from the Allgemeine Musikzeitung of September 30:—

The Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium has published its report for 1898. We learn from this that the Institution was attended by 369 pupils, of whom 25 were free. A large number of pupils appeared in public during the course of the winter, some giving concerts of their own, and some assisting at concerts given by other artists. The final examination of the instrumental and vocal classes obtained most satisfactory results.

Several important changes have taken place in the teaching staff of the Conservatorium. To the general regret, Professor Karl Klindworth has felt obliged to retire from the staff in order to devote himself in future to private teaching. What a loss this is felt to be can be estimated from the words in which the report records the fact of the retirement of the honoured artist. They are as follows:

"Klindworth, whose name in conjunction with Scharwenka's the Institution will continue to bear, founded in 1884 a conservatorium for music in Berlin, which became in a short time one of the most pre-eminent of music schools. In the year 1893 it joined forces with the Scharwenka Conservatorium, and Klindworth continued to be the artistic director and principal master for pianoforte playing. He gave his full powers to the work, and rich artistic success crowned his efforts for five years. Not only did so many pupils crowd to his own classes that only his wonderful energy enabled him, at his advanced age of sixty-seven years, to cope with the work; but he was also able to see with satisfaction how the name, which he had made so celebrated both as teacher and artist, reflected glory on the Institution, and caused it to become more and more developed and respected. It is therefore to the great regret of all that we lose from our midst the man to whom all the members of the staff looked up with unconditional veneration, whose sense of duty was an example to them, and whose artistic spirit influenced and animated them all. May the astonishing energy which he has hitherto shown be long preserved to him in his old age, and long enable him to continue his work in the direction in which success has always attended him as a disciple and pioneer of Progress in Art."

Professor Klindworth will, however, continue to give his class and private pianoforte lessons in Berlin, at the pianoforte warehouse of Mr. Müller, Potsdamer Strasse, No. 119. He will have the assistance of a professor of theory, who will give his class lessons in English, for the benefit of those whose German may not be a strong point, and a professor of the violin has been engaged for ensemble music.

Professor Klindworth is announced to visit England during the present month for the purpose of conducting two orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall, on the 22nd and 29th inst. The programme of the first concert will consist of:—

1. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; 2. Liszt's Second Pianoforte Concerto (in A), played by Mr. Frederick Dawson; 3. Selection from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet": (a) Fête chez Capulet, (b) Scène d'amour, (c) Fée Mab; 4. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture.

The programme of the second concert (on the 29th inst.) is hardly less interesting:—

1. Weber's "Der Freischütz" Overture; 2 and 3. Brahms's Pianoforte Concertos, No. 1, in D minor, and No. 2, in B flat, both played by Mr. Frederick Dawson; 4. Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture.

Apart from the intrinsic merits of the music to be performed on these two occasions, and the opportunity that will be afforded of hearing the two pianoforte concertos of Brahms performed in immediate succession, these concerts are sure to arouse special interest from the fact that they will be conducted by so distinguished a musician and eminent conductor as Karl Klindworth.

The recently published "Memoirs" of the late Henry Reeve, the distinguished editor of the Edinburgh Review and one of H. F. Chorley's literary friends, contains an interesting reference to Liszt, on an occasion when the playing of that king of pianists ended in a fit of hysteria. In his youth Reeve lived much abroad. During his sojourn in Paris, in the year 1835, when he was twenty-one, he was present at a concert given by Liszt, then in his twenty-fourth year. Reeve thus describes the scene:—

When we arrived at the concert-room, it was very full, and I stood the greater part of the evening. I do not know whether I ever described to you my friend Liszt. His person is slight and tall, a delicate frame, not worn or wasted by weakness and malady, but perpetually strained by the flow of animated thoughts, by the violence of a musical soul, for which no sound affords an adequate expression. Liszt had already played a great Fantasia of his own and Beethoven's 27th Sonata, in the former part of the concert. After this latter piece he gasped with emotion as I took his hand and thanked him for the divine energy he had shed forth. At last I had managed to pierce the crowd and I sat in the orchestra . . . my chair was on the same board as Liszt's piano when the final piece began. It was a duet for two instruments, beginning with Mendelssohn's "Chants sans Paroles," and proceeding to a work of Liszt's. We had already passed that delicious chime of the "Song written in a gondola." . . . As the closing strains began, I saw Liszt's countenance assume that agony of expression, mingled with radiant smiles of joy, which I never saw on any other human face, except in the paintings of our Saviour by some of the early masters; his hands rushed over the keys, the floor on which I sat shook like a wire, and the whole audience were wrapped in sound, when the hand and frame of the artist gave way; he fainted in the arms of the friend who was turning over for him, and we bore him out in a strong fit of hysterics. The effect of this scene was really dreadful. The whole room sat breathless with fear, until Hiller came forward and announced that Liszt was already restored to consciousness, and was comparatively well again. As I handed Mdme. de Circourt to her carriage, we both trembled like poplar leaves, and I tremble scarcely less as I write.

Any utterance of so distinguished and versatile a writer and antiquary as the Reverend S. Baring Gould is sure to be interesting. Mr. Baring Gould has written the libretto of a comic opera, entitled "Red Spider," composed by Mr. Learmont Drysdale, which was produced at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, Liverpool, on the 13th ult. At the close of the performance the author was called before the curtain, when he made the following very pertinent remarks on English opera, and the domination of the music hall in the amusements of the people. We quote from The Times report:—

Mr. Baring Gould said he believed he was expressing the purpose of the composer as well as his own when he said that their object was to stem a current adverse to the English romantic musical drama and threatening to sweep it away. The English musical drama had its birth last century in Gay's "Beggar's Opera," which emptied the benches of the Italian Opera-house and revealed to the dilettanti that the English people dearly loved their home-made music to English themes. The adverse current to which he alluded was the music hall entertainment, which had invaded and altered the character of English opera, reducing it to the merest thread of story strung with a succession of not always relevant songs. He ventured to think this tendency was to be resisted. Secondly, he thought they had gone too much to foreign themes for their English operas, deserting the path indicated by Gay, Arnold, and Dibdin. Surely English country or sea life supplied abundant material, and if the opera were an idealisation, the motives of the heart—love, good humour, self-devotion, and mirth—were the same in all ages.

"The Deluge," as the subject of an oratorio, has attracted the attention of at least one other composer—if, indeed, he can be called a composer—in addition to Mr. Frederic H. Cowen and M. Saint-Saëns. Robert Nicolas Charles Bochsa is the name of that composer, and he it was who produced his oratorio of "The Deluge," the libretto "written by C. Dibdin, Esq." (whether the elder or younger is not stated), at the Lenten Oratorios, Covent Garden Theatre, on February 22, 1822. Three weeks earlier, quite regardless of chronological propriety, "Moses in Egypt" had been given, with such success as to anticipate a natural feature of the Bochsa business. The playbill of "The Deluge" performance actually stated that, "In consequence of the great overflow from the Pit on the 30th of January last, the Theatrical Orchestra will be opened for the accommodation of the public." Whether the said "Theatrical Orchestra," after their experiences with "Moses in Egypt," and in anticipation of the event associated with the name of Noah, found a Mount Ararat of their own is not recorded. It would be interesting to know if they—the orchestra—found the music very dry. It was probably very watery.

"The analytical program-book is an impertinence to the musician, a stumbling-block to the amateur, an injustice to the composer." Thus says Musical Record, and, as it is published at the Hub of the Universe, it ought to know. We should be almost inclined to believe the statement, if the following extract from the "Boston Symphony Program Book" were the only specimen of the programist's handiwork. Here it is: "Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. The Philistines have taken to use Samson's favorite weapon, but with the difference that they do not take it from the dead animal." Mr. Edgar P. Jacques must soar to far greater heights than he has hitherto analytically attained in any attempt to rival that programist of cultured Boston, Mass.

"The annual performance of Mendelssohn's 'Judas Maccabæus'" was announced to be given at the People's Palace, Mile End Road, on the 22nd ult. We seem to have some sort of dim and distant recollection of hearing of an oratorio entitled "Judas Maccabæus" by Handel, but not by the composer of "Elijah"; however, we are quite open to correction. By the way, how very appropriate a performance of Handel's "Water Music" would have been at the People's Palace during the recent water famine in the East-End, played, of course, in the main on standpipes.

Handel's "Elijah" was announced to be performed by the Kyrle Society at St. George the Martyr, Southwark, on the 26th ult.—so said the Daily Mail.

The old-established business of Messrs. Robert Cocks and Company—goodwill, copyrights, and musical instruments—is about to be sold by auction, by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, the first portion of the sale beginning on the 7th inst. Messrs. Cocks's music-publishing business has existed for three-quarters of a century, it having been founded in the year 1823. The Royal Academy of Music was opened in the same year.

Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland will deliver a series of four lectures on "The Music of Johannes Brahms," at the late Lord Leighton's house, 2, Holland Park Road, Kensington, at 5 p.m., on Thursdays in November. The subject will be divided as follows: November 3, Pianoforte Works; November 10, Concerted Instrumental Works; November 17, Choral and Orchestral Works; November 24, Songs. The proceeds will be devoted to the fund for erecting a monument to the composer in Vienna.

Professor Villiers Stanford will form the subject of the Biographical Sketch in our December issue.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," in spite of the absence of the prestige attached to a work that has been produced at an important Festival, is making remarkable headway. Performances are already announced to be given at the Royal College of Music (London), Plymouth, Torquay, Sunderland, Glasgow, The People's Palace (London), Bridlington, and Middlesbrough. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's Gloucester Festival work, the Orchestral Ballade in A minor, is to be performed at several musical centres, London, naturally, not included. In such a respect London is a musical *dis*centre.

Dr. Henry Fisher, of Blackpool, is the author of "The Pianist's Mentor: a text book for students of all grades" (J. Curwen and Sons). The book is founded on the fact that "it epitomises the experience gathered during the writer's long and busy career as a teacher of the piano." Teachers of the pianoforte will find many useful hints scattered throughout Dr. Fisher's pages.

Dr. E. J. Hopkins, reversing the practice of many dwellers in the Metropolis, spends the week-end in London, when, notwithstanding his octogenarianism, he does a day's teaching every Monday at the Normal College for the Blind at Norwood. During the remainder of the week he resides at his Herne Bay residence, where he is hard at work on his forthcoming "Handbook of the Organ."

Sir Walter Parratt, who had the honour of dining with the Queen and the Royal Family during his recent brief stay at Balmoral Castle, conducted the musical portion of the Memorial Service for Her Majesty the Queen of Denmark held in Crathie Church, on the 15th ult.

Mr. J. Percy Baker has just issued a practical little sixpenny pamphlet, entitled "The choir boy's handy book of musical theory and vocal exercises," which he has dedicated to his old master, Dr. Charles Steggall.

Dr. William Creser, organist and composer to Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, has been appointed the Examiner for Trinity College (London) in India this year in practical subjects: pianoforte, organ, violin, singing, &c.

Mr. Ernest Ford has been appointed director of the operatic class at the Guildhall School of Music. An excellent choice.

Sir Arthur Sullivan has joined the Board of Direction of the Crystal Palace Company, which is being reconstructed with regard to its financial basis.

The Lincoln and Peterborough Triennial Oratorio Festival will be held (by permission of the Dean and Chapter) in Lincoln Cathedral, on Thursday, June 8, 1899. The principal works selected for performance are Gounod's "Redemption," Brahms's "Requiem," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

The Dean and Chapter of Norwich have instructed Messrs. Norman and Beard to build a new organ for the Cathedral at a cost of £3,000. The new instrument, like its predecessor, will stand on the screen. It is expected to be completed by next June.

Maxim for a young pupil:—"Take care of the pianos: the fortes will take care of themselves."

CHURCH MUSIC.

The most interesting Church news of recent date, and dealing with sacred art, was contained in the addresses on the subject delivered at the Church Congress held at Bradford. Sir Walter Parratt, as is his wont, pronounced his views, and very interesting they proved to be, with straightforward clearness and decision. The first chief point of his discourse was a feeling and thoughtful appeal for the overworked and much too small Cathedral choir; and nothing could be more timely than this appeal.

Then he quite gently urged congregations not to join in trying to sing Cathedral music they did not know. Again these words were timely, for there is still a sufficient number of church-goers who, knowing nothing of music, "rush in where angels" might well "fear to tread." It was more difficult to follow Sir Walter with satisfaction when he urged that: "The Confession, Apostles' Creed, and Litany ought always to be said and not sung." This opinion was partly based upon a desire to relieve the tiring tediousness of the monotone.

With regard to the Confession, it might be urged that the beautiful ancient comma and sentence inflections of the ancient Latin Confession, so strangely neglected, will afford the necessary relief and variety. Taking the question all round, it may be asked, Is not the simple people's song their real medium of public worship, as distinguished from private prayer? This view would seem to have guided the Church in ancient times, and surely remains a good argument for the complete employment of choral services.

The proposal of Sir Walter Parratt to judiciously mingle ancient with modern music was an admirable piece of advice. Some forty years ago the late Cardinal Wiseman gave similar advice to the musical authorities of his own Church, with the difference that he recommended the judicious employment of the ancient plain chant with the music of the various great schools of Church music from the sixteenth century onwards. This was not only eminently practical advice, but it further enforced an expansive thought to the effect that the Church belongs to all ages, and possesses a glorious continuity of sacred art linking all time into one great song of prayer and praise.

One of the most valuable and practical utterances of the distinguished organist of Windsor Chapel Royal was his denunciation of the monster organs in our Cathedrals and other churches, and he justly said "everything that can be desired could be obtained in fifty sounding stops." He further condemned these huge, roaring giants as disfiguring our fine churches and occupying precious space, an invasion never contemplated by the great architects of our noble cruciform churches. It is to be hoped these words will have good effect ere the rage for organ idolatry has been carried hopelessly too far.

Dr. Percy Buck, the organist of Wells Cathedral, gave an address on the subject of the ancient Plain-song of the Church. He summarised the points in favour of the old Psalm chants thus:—

(1) Plain-song is the only authorised Church music (see Queen Elizabeth's injunctions). It is not for me to discuss how far this is an argument in favour; indeed, I will admit that if the music were proved unworthy, then no amount of authority would convince me that it ought not to be supplanted. (2) It is the most ancient Church music, having in the case of psalmody an origin possibly contemporary with the words. Whatever may be the force of authority, traditions should certainly carry weight. Chants which survived throughout the Church down to the end of the seventeenth century should not lightly be set aside for a substitute certainly not superior. These "tones" owed their survival to their strength, and their strength to their origin, for they were the gradually-perfected work of a series of humble, unknown men, who laboured in obscurity with love and patience, impelled from within to give utterance to the faith that was in them. (3) The tones preserve, and even adorn, the beauty of the Psalms. This they do by allowing the natural accent of the words, and by progressing at a slow pace. The singers have but to know the notes of their tone by heart, and then accent the words exactly as they would in reading. (4) The tones are easier to sing, both for choir and congregation, and can be joined in by that large number of persons who have no singing voice. This is partly due to the absence of any suspicion of breathless hurry in singing, partly to the fact that, as all the notes of the tones are well within the speaking voice, they may be almost monotoned by those who cannot sing well.

Dr. Buck's words have a by no means indirect ring of sympathy with the previously quoted opinions of Cardinal Wiseman. In both cases there is an underlying thought of the employment of the artistic wealth of the Church with appropriate judgment, and with the right application of all means, be they simple or elaborate, old or new.

One feature of the Harvest Festival at St. David's, Merthyr Tydfil, was a violin and organ recital, in which Mr. A. C. Handley-Davies with Mr. T. Davies, of Cardiff, took part. Further, at the Sunday services on the same occasion, the assistance of a small orchestra was secured; an arrangement alike indicative of the advance of Church music and of the growth of instrumental music in Wales.

From Thorpe Parish Church comes a list of special oratorio services for the ecclesiastical year beginning with Advent. Among the new works undertaken are Mr. Somervell's "A Song of Praise," "Intercession," by H. T. C. Collis, Dr. Alan Gray's "A Song of Redemption," and "A Harvest Song of Praise" by Stephenson, a composer whose name is not familiar to us. The year's work thus announced evidences earnestness and method, and will, it is to be hoped, be crowned with success. An interesting feature at a musical service at St. David's, Denbigh, during the past month was the introduction of Garrett's Harvest Cantata, which, one would suppose, should command a wider recognition than it has so far received.

The Harvest Festival season has been kept with even more than "wonted fervour." At St. Anne's, Soho, Handel's Twelfth Chandos Anthem and Dr. Hopkins's Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur were sung; the service music being orchestrated by the able organist of the church, Mr. E. H. Thorne. At Uppingham Parish Church, Dykes's Te Deum, scored for orchestra by Mr. G. Lightfoot, the organist, Dr. Lloyd's setting of the Evening Canticles, and Hall's anthem "O God, Thou art praised," scored for orchestra by the organist, were sung. The instrumental music was selected from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Haydn's Second Symphony, Beethoven's First Symphony, and included Handel's "Occasional" Overture. The music at St. Philip's, Queen's Road, Battersea, formed quite an imposing list, including, as it did, two of Smart's Services, Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Barnby's "I will give thanks," Tours's "While the earth remaineth," Martin's 150th Psalm, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

At Abney Congregational Church, Stoke Newington, a place of worship recalling memories of Dr. Isaac Watts, the hymn-writer, the Harvest Festival, on the 16th ult., was celebrated musically under the direction of Mr. Leonard C. F. Robson. Spohr's "God, Thou art great," was a vocal feature of the evening service, and the organ, it is satisfactory to note, was supplemented by a small "string" orchestra.

ORGAN MUSIC.

One of the most interesting MS. compositions left by the late Dr. Garrett has recently been issued by Novello and Co., Limited. This is a Fantasie Overture for organ, built upon quite sonata lines, with stately introduction, vigorous, but withal, graceful Allegro in the keys of D minor and major, with, by way of episode, a singularly melodious Andante espressivo. So characteristic and fine a piece of musicianship will soon have a prominent place in the répertoires of organ players.

The organ recital has long since claimed a place in connection with the harvest festival, and a good many organists have been engaged in unfolding the beauties of organ music upon these joyous occasions during the past month. In addition, however, to these special opportunities, many excellent performances during the same period show that the recitals of the musical year have recommenced in earnest. Amongst these schemes is announced a series which has been planned and arranged for by Dr. Warriner, who has secured the Royal College of Organists as his field of action, and has been fortunate enough to obtain the services of so distinguished a performer as Sir Walter Parratt to lead the way, by a recital to be given before these lines reach our readers.

Mr. E. H. Lemare's excellent recitals at St. Margaret's, Westminster, still continue to attract special attention. To show the wide scope of Mr. Lemare's selections, it will suffice to say that one programme included Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture. Another of the St. Margaret's recital programmes included Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C and the Finale to Dvorák's symphony "The New World." A special feature of interest has been the production of Mr. E. H. Lemare's new organ symphony in G minor, the Adagio of which has been repeated by desire.

At the Moravian Church, Salem, Oldham, Mr. Herbert England gave a good selection recently, including a well-written Fantasia and Fugue by Herr Otto Dienel, the well-known Berlin organist. On the 4th ult., at the Parish Church, Ealing, Mr. Owen H. Mead played a recital, including in his scheme Bach's Toccata and Fugue in E major and Mr. E. d'Evry's Meditation in F and Toccata in C. At Kelvinside, Glasgow, on the 11th ult., Mr. J. H. M. Ledger's programme included a Sonata in A minor, by Dr. Creser, which was listened to with interest and appreciation, and a Grand Marche Triomphale, by J. Grison. On the same date Mr. F. G. M. Ogbourne gave a recital at Trinity College (London), his scheme including Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C and a well-considered rendering of Rheinberger's fine Sonata in A minor (No. 18). Mr. George Vincent has been giving a very interesting series of organ recitals at St. Thomas's Church, Sunderland. Upon the last of these occasions his scheme included a Caprice of his own and movements by Smart, Lemmens, and Widor. Mr. Herbert Gisby gave a recital at St. Nicholas Cole-Abbey recently, in the course of which he played such interesting pieces as Rheinberger's Sonata in C (Op. 165) and an Organ Concerto in C by Dr. W. B. Gilbert, who, it will be remembered, returned to London a few months ago, after a long and successful professional residence in New York, and who was one of the original members of the Royal College of Organists.

Recitals have recently been given at St. David's, Denbigh, by Mr. A. H. Allen, the programmes of which were of high class if not novel materials. At Holy Trinity Church, Upper Tooting, a recital was given by Mr. Charles Stott, whose programme included pieces by such recognised and promising younger composers of the English school as Messrs. E. H. Lemare, E. d'Evry, E. T. Driffield, and Arthur Foote. The organ at St. Walburge's, Preston, after a thorough overhauling by the builders, Messrs. Hill and Son, has been re-opened, when the organist, Mr. Chas. Beddoe, played a suitable selection of organ music, vocal sacred music being also given upon the occasion.

Mr. H. M. Higgs's clever incidental music to Baring Gould's poem "The Building of San Sofia" was performed by Mr. E. G. Croager on the organ, at the [illegible] of the Blind School, Swiss Cottage, on the [illegible]lt., and by the composer at the Queen's (Small) [illegible]n a Mustel organ) on the 22nd ult., Mr. Charles [illegible]iting the poem on each occasion.

At the Temple Street Wesleyan Chapel, Keighley, Mr. L. Barton gave a recital, in which Dr. Prout's fine Organ Concerto was performed with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. J. Keighley's organ recital at the Parr Hall, Warrington, on the 18th ult., was made specially interesting by the performance of Dr. H. Hiles's excellent organ pieces, the Sonata in G minor and Impromptus, Nos. 8 and 12. Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, of Gloucester, gave a recital at St. Mary's, East Brent, on the 19th ult. His programme included two pieces of his own, a Melody in A, and Minuet and Trio in D. Mr. J. Capner gave a recital at St. John's, Hackney, on the 20th ult. His admirable performance included Mendelssohn's Sonata, No. 4, and Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C. A feature of the recital was the expressive and artistic singing of Miss Bushnell, an Australian contralto.

Mr. Sydney F. Somers, organist of Odiham Parish Church, commenced a series of recitals on the 19th ult., with the assistance of Miss Bessie Greenhill (violin). Mr. Somers proposes to play all Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas at future recitals.

At St. Thomas's Church, Crooke, the Rev. J. S. Barry gave a recital, on the 16th ult., his pieces including Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor and Widor's Organ Symphony, No. 5.

THE LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

In one important respect Leeds is greatly to be envied of other festival towns. Its festival committee can draw up their programmes without being constantly haunted by the fear whether they may attract or repel the public to whom they appeal. A festival which, for the past eighteen years, has never failed to make a profit of from £2,000 to £3,000 is an institution that commends itself to the hard-headed Yorkshireman, whose confidence is shown by the avidity with which he puts down his name as a guarantor. It is understood to be thoroughly recognised in Leeds that to have one's name opposite a substantial sum is to all intents and purposes as satisfactory as its appearance in a subscription list, without the annoying pecuniary liability that attaches in the latter instance. Consequently, it is not surprising to find that the guarantee fund on the present occasion amounted to over £40,000—a record at this and probably every other provincial festival.

An indirect result of this prosperity is the comparative absence of the hackneyed from the programme. I do not so much refer to the orchestral pieces, which presented nothing of commanding interest or novelty, as to the choral works. At the Three Choirs the necessity of a liberal allowance of the most familiar oratorios is an obvious necessity. The wants of the people, who have not so many opportunities of hearing good choral concerts as are fairly common in the West Riding; the necessity of appealing to popular tastes; and, above all, the very limited time allowed to full rehearsal; these afford an ample excuse for repeating, year after year, half-a-dozen stock oratorios.

The committee, in a manifesto prefacing the programme, expressed their belief that the performance of Bach's B minor Mass and Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony would be welcomed by all musicians, and went on to point out that not the least important feature of the festival would be the adoption of the low pitch, which would not only enable these two masterpieces to be heard in accordance with the intention of their composers, but should materially lighten the labours of the singers. Both these prophecies were fulfilled. Now that the majority of London orchestras employ the normal diapason, its adoption was a gain rather than a hindrance to the band, composed as it was exclusively of London players. As for the chorus, though it would be absurd to say they showed any marked improvement in these great works, which they have long made their own, it can at least be affirmed that in no respect was there deterioration. In delicacy there was indeed a distinct advance. That Bach's Sanctus was more impressive than it has ever been at Leeds is due chiefly to the fact that Sir Arthur Sullivan took it at a distinctly slower speed than heretofore, more closely approaching to that adopted by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and very greatly to its advantage in nobility and grandeur of effect. To the quality of the choir, on the other hand, must the fine singing of the Crucifixus be attributed. Not only was the intonation distinctly better than at either of the former performances, but the beautiful pianissimo at the close was an achievement that will not easily be forgotten. The soloists in the Mass were Miss Palliser, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Plunket Greene, who did excellently well, though they could not hide the fact that Bach's solo writing is overshadowed by his colossal choral effects. Two pieces, the Agnus Dei and the Dona nobis, were omitted, and though one cannot but sympathise with those who resented being deprived of a single note of Bach's music, it was surely going too far to denounce the omission as an act of Vandalism. It is only necessary to point out that a Mass is different from an oratorio, never being meant to be heard continuously; that this particular Mass is in its origin practically a compilation from various sources; and that it is hardly consistent to protest against omissions in Bach and to accept the omissions, and worse than omissions, to which Handel's music is always subjected in performance.

My allusion to Handel is prompted by the recollection of the treatment to which his "Alexander's Feast" was subjected, by a curious coincidence, the very same day as that on which Bach's Mass had been heard. Handel has, of course, an incontestable right to be heard at a great choral festival, and it is obviously appropriate that he should be represented by a work that is comparatively unknown to the present generation, so far as actual concert performances are concerned. Of the cuts that Sir Arthur Sullivan made it would be mere pedantry to complain. In our impatient age the perpetual Da capo and incessant repetition are simply wearisome. But if Handel's music is worth doing at all, it is worth doing well, and the slackness and indifference that manifested themselves in the Leeds performance made the blood of at least one hearer boil. From this somewhat sweeping charge I would particularly except Mr. Ben Davies, who, in the air "Softly sweet" and the strongly contrasted "War, he sung," showed that Handel may be made effective if only he be taken seriously.

From what I personally look upon as the blot of the festival it is pleasant to pass to the second of the great "test works." It came in Saturday morning's programme, in Beethoven's colossal "Choral" Symphony, and the performance, taking it all round, may certainly be said to have "crowned the work." Sir Arthur Sullivan's reading, though not so broad or impressive in its general outlines as that of Richter, for example, is thoroughly sympathetic and artistic, and is marked by a close attention to details. The virile rhythm of the Scherzo is certainly apt to be slurred over when it is taken at his excessively quick tempo; but the first movement lent itself to his reticent interpretation, and the vocal character of the third was admirably brought out. As for the choral Finale, it was sung with all the delightful absence of apparent effort that alone can reconcile one to it. The relief afforded the chorus by the lower pitch need not be insisted on.

The novelties proved unusually interesting. Mr. Elgar made his first appearance at a Leeds festival with his cantata "Caractacus," a work showing the same extraordinary freshness, vigour, and wealth of colour that distinguish his "King Olaf." It was only at the eleventh hour that the committee gave Mr. Elgar the commission, and I think it is possible to perceive some signs of haste in the vocal writing. The composer uses the leading motive system more thoroughly, more consistently, and with greater freedom than any other British composer. He introduces, develops, and combines his themes with amazing ease and mastery, and quite belies the common notion that they are necessarily a hindrance to inspiration. At the same time, he is not content to follow Wagner's plan of making the solo voice parts chiefly declamatory, save at moments when the expression of a strong emotion calls for a more lyrical treatment. The effort to fit in the vocal melody with the symphonic music of the orchestra has, then, the natural result that the soloists have to sing many passages that are not only crabbed from a melodic point of view, but fail to give full value to the words. Having allowed for this defect, enough remains to stamp the composer as a thoroughly original and inspired genius. His score is brimful of ideas—perhaps almost too full—and his fertility of resource is quite remarkable. He can be vigorous, as in the dashing Song of the Sword; grandiose, as in the processional music of the last scene; tender, as in the delicious sylvan music that introduces the third scene; or deeply impressive, as in the noble "Lament"—in 7-4 time, by the way—a truly inspired piece. There is, indeed, in "Caractacus" sufficient material to set up half-a-dozen average composers for life. And Mr. Elgar has one excellent characteristic—he is always himself. It may be possible to find a snatch of melody reminiscent of something; the law of permutations and combinations make it impossible that it should be otherwise. This rarely happens, however, even with the melodies, and never with their treatment, which is always fresh and original. Certainly, a single hearing of "Caractacus" makes one anxious for another, which may be taken as a very wholesome sign. The performance was remarkably good, considering the difficulty of the music and the impossibility of really adequate full rehearsal. Madame Medora Henson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Andrew Black worked indefatigably in the chief parts, and Mr. John Browning and Mr. Charles Knowles, two very efficient local basses, took the smaller ones with credit. The composer conducted.

Dr. Stanford's Te Deum is cast in the same mould as his Requiem, and was written about the same time. As in the Birmingham work, there is mingled with Teutonic sobriety and intellectuality a distinct feeling of Latin sensuousness. The ingredients form a blend that is not in the least incongruous, and the work must be pronounced among the best balanced and best sustained of all Dr. Stanford's compositions. It is, moreover, thoroughly grateful and effective music. It soon won the favour of the chorus, and it was obvious that the soloists, Madame Albani, Madame Marian McKenzie, Messrs. Lloyd and Plunket Greene, liked their parts. The result of this and of Dr. Stanford's clear and inspiriting beat was one of the very best first performances I can recollect. One naturally compares Dr. Stanford's latest work with its immediate predecessor and pendant, the Requiem. Though the Te Deum, as a text for music, does not afford the same opportunity for emotional treatment, and there may be no moments of such power to move the hearer as are found in the Requiem, it is perhaps more evenly sustained and better balanced. The quartets, for example, are not only beautiful in themselves, but afford a grateful relief from the more developed movements that precede and follow them. So the hearer's interest is never allowed to flag, for not only is there genuine melodic beauty in the themes and ripe scholarship in their treatment, but there is that sense of proportion so necessary in every art-work conceived on a large scale.

If there may be differences of opinion as to the exact merits of Dr. Stanford's Te Deum as compared with his Requiem, there can be little doubt that Mr. Cowen's setting of Collins's poem, "The Passions," is as a whole the strongest choral work he has yet given us. The various pictures which the poet conjures up in rapid succession afford an opportunity for varied and suggestive descriptive music that is in Mr. Cowen's very happiest vein. His success, too, is by no means partial. One would expect him to be at home with "Cheerfulness, a nymph of healthiest hue," and so indeed he is; but he is at least equally happy in his treatment of Revenge, which shows genuine power. The four-part writing marks in many places an advance, one instance being the passage in which "Pale Melancholy" appears on the scene, while the well wrought peroration that begins with the apostrophe "O Music, sphere-descended maid," brings the work to a grandiose conclusion. Mr. Cowen's graceful and appropriate use of the orchestra need not be insisted on, for it is nothing new; but it must be said that it adds greatly to the suggestiveness and charm of the work. The Ode, which is for chorus only, and takes twenty-five minutes in performance, was sung and played with really admirable spirit, and, like the Te Deum, showed what could be got out of band and chorus by a practised and energetic conductor.

A fourth choral novelty was afforded in the "Song of Redemption," by Dr. Alan Gray, who, as a native of York, had a claim to be heard at the great Yorkshire festival. It is a setting, for soprano solo and chorus, of Mason Neale's Easter hymn "The foe behind," and is a short cantata evidencing sound musicianship and good taste. Madame Albani showed that much could be made of the solo part—a sort of Miriam's song—which she sang with great expression and admirable restraint. Last of the works specially written for the festival is Mr. Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" for orchestra. The composer, who is familiar with Southern Europe—he held for some years an important post at Barcelona—has here translated into music some of his experiences. The music is of the "programme" order, but its effectiveness does not by any means depend on its illustrative power. The first movement has for its subject an "Elegy at Sunset—Tarifa," the plaintive tones of a shepherd's pipe, combined with the glories of departing day, suggesting the past glories of the Moorish people. The same theme is suggested in the second movement in more definite fashion. It is styled "Scene in a Moorish Café—Tangiers." A popular song, recalling the once happy days of Moorish dominion, is sung by a native musician, with whom the others join in turn with an ever increasing animation, until at length they succumb to the effect of hashish and sink into a deep slumber. Of these the second movement, with its animation and humour, makes the more immediate impression, the other being rather protracted, especially as regards the long unison passage for the violins in altissimo with which the movement both begins and concludes. In both the composer takes charming snatches of diatonic melody and weaves them into a rare and beautiful texture of polyphony in his own individual manner. Unfortunately he is not at his best as a conductor, and there can be little doubt his music would make a still more favourable impression under a more practised and expressive beat. It may be added, too, that, to those who heard rehearsals as well as performance, the music gained enormously with each successive hearing.

There were two other novelties. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt contributed an "Ode," which turned out to be a soprano solo with an accompaniment for small chorus of female voices, harp, and organ. Though sung by Madame Albani, it was at a distinct disadvantage in a festival programme, and it reflects no great credit on the judgment of those who placed it in such a false position. Mr. Gabriel Fauré's "Naissance de Vénus," too, was somewhat out of place. It is a graceful, musicianly work, but lacks contrast, and not even Mr. Bispham could give much point or interest to a long and monotonous baritone solo. As it has been written some years, though not heard in England, it is rather difficult to understand on what principle it was admitted.

One of the most interesting features of the festival was the performance of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater" for double chorus, the work edited by Richard Wagner for the Court Church at Dresden. This was the first appearance of the Leeds chorus in Palestrina, and there was some curiosity, and perhaps a little misgiving, as to the result. There need not have been, for it was sung with a flexibility and beauty of vocal tone that placed the Leeds chorus in a new and even more favourable light than before. Wagner's edition was used, but his suggested employment of a double quartet of soloists was not adopted, and his marks of expression were considerably modified, chiefly in the direction of greater simplicity, by Sir Arthur Sullivan, who conducted this beautiful work with exceptional sympathy and good taste.

Second to nothing in the deep impression it made upon the audience was an unpretending little composition by Cornelius. This was his setting of Uhland's ballad "Die Vätergruft" for bass soloist, without any accompaniment save that of a small chorus. It was sung in German by Mr. Plunket Greene and the Leeds contingent of the chorus with a sympathy and delicacy past all praise, and, like the Palestrina, afforded a striking instance of the capacities of the West Riding singers in a new and unsuspected direction. Brahms's Rhapsody (Op 53), very finely sung by Madame Brema, was another striking feature in the programme, and the Wagner selection proved distinctly more successful than usual, Madame Brema and Mr. Bispham giving it real distinction by their fine reading of the last scene from "Die Walküre," which, it will be remembered, they sang at Birmingham a year ago. The purely orchestral pieces were good, but presented no features of special interest, a very finished performance of Mozart's "Prague" Symphony standing out from among them in one's mind as most worthy of remembrance.

It remains to pay a tribute to the excellent band, composed entirely of London players of eminence, with the exception of one or two additional instruments for Bach's Mass, and Mr. Fricker, the recently appointed Town Hall organist. Sir Arthur Sullivan, who conducted for the seventh time a Leeds Festival, performed his duties with his accustomed zeal and ability, and deserves congratulations on the success of the festival.

A word or two on the organisation of the chorus may be of interest. As at the festivals of 1892 and 1895, the singers, numbering 356 in all, were chosen from different centres in the West Riding. Leeds naturally supplied the largest contingent, furnishing 149 voices, trained by Mr. Alfred Benton, organist of the Parish Church. The other contingents were from Bradford, 52 voices, trained by Mr. F. K. Hattersley, of Leeds; Huddersfield, 51 voices, trained by Mr. John Bowling; Halifax, 52 voices, trained by Mr. Thomas Smith; and Dewsbury with Batley, 52 voices, trained by Mr. J. Bowling. There was a greater infusion of new blood than usual, quite one-half being new members as against about one-third in previous years. This system of local contingents, though it presents obvious practical difficulties in the way of rehearsal and involves great expense, has two overwhelming advantages: it widens the area of selection, and consequently makes it possible to adopt a higher standard for each individual singer, and it distributes an interest in the festival over the whole West Riding, instead of confining it to Leeds.

On the organisation and finance of the festival there is little need to dilate. It reflects the same credit upon the Hon. Sec., Mr. F. R. Spark, and the committee that has been due to their labours in past years. It may be necessary in future to place some restriction upon the enormous audiences at the full rehearsals, which certainly tended to hinder business. At the same time, the admission of the friends of the chorus and committee does undoubtedly form some answer to the reproach that only wealthy people can taste of festival enjoyments. This reproach had indeed more weight than usual on this occasion, when the hall was filled with none but first seats at all the concerts covered by the ordinary serial tickets, and only on Saturday night were there any second seats. It is pretty safe to assume that this is a "record."

RICHTER CONCERTS.

There is really very little to be said about these concerts, for the simple reason that the programmes contained absolutely no novelties, the performances were almost as superlatively fine as any that Dr. Richter has ever conducted, and the orchestra is neither worse nor better than it has been for years past. The first concert, on the 17th ult., attracted a huge audience to the Queen's Hall, and the great conductor's reception was, if anything, even heartier than usual. London music-lovers love their "dear old Hans Richter," and never fail to show their affection when he is in their midst.

A programme consisting of a few dreadfully hackneyed Wagner pieces and an equally hackneyed Beethoven Symphony can be made enjoyable enough by a conductor of Dr. Richter's stamp, but even the superb playing (if we except one very bad false entry by one of the solo violins) of the orchestra cannot make Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," anything else than an infliction. We expressed a very strong opinion on this work a few months ago (page 389), and after this new hearing we are more than ever inclined to resent the inclusion of such an empty, irritatingly prolix effusion in a programme otherwise devoted to two such giants as Beethoven and Wagner. We see no occasion to withdraw one word of what we said before. On the contrary, we were more than ever delighted with the superb orchestration, which excels in beauty and raffinement anything that even Tschaïkowsky ever attempted; but we were also more than ever annoyed by the endless reiteration of a few short and more or less uninteresting phrases until they become positively hateful. If splendid orchestration could make a work great, then this Russian composer's suite should be accounted a masterpiece of the highest rank. But that part of a musician's technique, highly as it is valued in these days, has never yet alone helped a composition to greatness, and never will. To young composers wishing for a valuable lesson in orchestration, this "Scheherazade" will be a boon. But we hope they will content themselves with the perusal of the full score in the sanctum of their study. Of the Wagner pieces, the "Charfreitagszauber" from "Parsifal" and the Introduction to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger" were played with all the wonderful serenity which Dr. Richter knows so well how to infuse into them. The "Tannhäuser" Overture and the Tristan Prelude and "Liebestod," on the other hand, we have heard better performed on previous occasions. In the "Eroica" Symphony conductor and band were at their best, hence we were regaled with a magnificent reading of that glorious masterpiece.

At the second concert, on the 24th ult., a new pianist, Herr Ernest de Dohnányi, made his first appearance in England, and, after his performance of Beethoven's Fourth (G major) Concerto, left no doubt in his hearers' minds that he is a real artist. The exquisite first movement was played with a poetry and finish, a beauty of phrasing, and a wonderful command of tone gradations that were quite enchanting. Scarcely less excellent were his readings of the short Andante and the final Rondo, though in these his shakes were a little unsatisfactory. However, looking upon the performance as a whole, we were delighted with the young artist's account of what is, from an interpretative point of view, one of the most difficult works in the pianist's répertoire. He will be heard of again. The orchestral accompaniments were played with the utmost refinement and beauty of tone; nothing, in fact, could have been better. The "Meistersinger" Overture (for which we feel inclined to thank Heaven each time we hear it!) went splendidly and was, as usual, pure enjoyment. Tschaïkowsky's Third Suite, with those trivial, not to say laughable Trios to the Waltz and Scherzo, the very melodious and impassioned Elegie, and the brilliant variations, as well as the "Harold en Italie" Symphony by Berlioz, were given with all possible brilliancy and dignity. Even where the music itself seemed devoid of the latter quality, Dr. Richter did his best to cause his audience to believe that dignity should ever be upheld in our art. And for this we owe him thanks.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Mr. Robert Newman's fourth series of Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall was concluded on the 15th ult., when the enterprising manager took his benefit, which was attended by a crowded audience.

The artistic value of these concerts has been fully maintained, and since the notice of them in our issue for October many interesting performances have been given and several novelties produced. The recently formed "Gomez Clarinet Quartet" made its first appearance on September 25, and won immediate acceptance by reason of the rich quality of the tone produced by this combination and the skill evinced by the players. These were Messrs. Manuel Gomez, P. Egerton, G. W. Anderson, and F. Gomez, who severally used two B flat clarinets, a tenor, and a bass clarinet. At the same concert a new orchestral piece, entitled "Sweet Brier," by Mr. W. H. Squire, was produced, and proved a dainty and piquant composition in gavotte measure. A notable feature of this evening was the performance of a paraphrase, by Mr. Percy Pitt, of Paganini's familiar piece for violins and orchestra, entitled "Moto Perpetuo." Mr. Pitt has shown artistic discretion in his arrangement and it was played with the utmost brilliancy by the first and second violins, with Mr. A. W. Payne and Mr. W. H. Eayres doubling the solo part. Tschaïkowsky's Symphony in four tableaux after Byron's "Manfred" was heard for the first time in England on September 28. It was probably written about 1886 and is decidedly a pretentious work. The composer has furnished a programme which closely follows the scheme of Byron's poem, and in striving to give musical expression to its tragic elements he has written some very impressive passages. It contains a highly original and attractive Scherzo, but, taken as a whole, it is inferior to Tschaïkowsky's last three symphonies—and it took one hour and three minutes in performance.

The following night Mr. W. H. Squire introduced a new and pleasing Serenade for violoncello solo by Mr. J. Ansell, a member of the Queen's Hall orchestra, who was born in 1874 and is a pupil at the Guildhall School of Music. Mr. Albert Fransella's highly trained Flute Quartet also appeared and played with delightful clearness and unanimity.

On the 1st ult. notable pieces in the programme were the Bourrée and Gigue from Mr. Edward German's incidental music to "Much Ado about Nothing," written for Mr. Alexander's revival of the play on February 17 last, at the St. James's Theatre. These pieces had not previously been heard in the concert-room, but assuredly they should become familiar to concert-goers, for they are thoroughly English in conception and expression, and in spirit have much in common with the popular "Henry VIII." Dances by the same composer. Mr. Sims Reeves, who a few days before had celebrated his eightieth birthday, made a re-appearance on this evening at these concerts and, considering his years, sang with wonderful expression and vigour.

The first performance in London of Liszt's sixth Hungarian Rhapsody in G was claimed to be given on the 3rd ult., and, in common with some of its companions, proved a highly characteristic and richly scored piece.

Tschaïkowsky's Fantasia for orchestra (Op. 18), on Shakespeare's play "The Tempest," was performed for the first time in London on the 5th ult. This was composed in 1873 at the suggestion of the distinguished scholar, Vladimir Stassoff, and is programme music of a pronounced type. It contains some remarkable passages, but must be regarded as a work of promise rather than achievement. Miss Katie Goodson's brilliant rendering of the solo part of Tschaïkowsky's exuberant Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor was a feature of this concert.

The performance on the following evening was begun with a Festmarsch (Op. 1) by Richard Strauss. Being acquainted with this composer's symphonic poems "Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks" and "Thus spake Zarathustra," it was interesting to hear his first attempt, but having heard it we do not yearn to do so again. The first concert performance in England of the Polonaise from Tschaïkowsky's opera "Eugène Oneguin" was also claimed to be given on this evening.

A "Mazur" (Mazurka) from Stanislas Moniuszko's opera "Halka" opened the concert on the 8th ult., and proved a stirring example of this dance. "Halka" was Moniuszko's first opera, and was produced at Warsaw in 1846, where he died in 1872. Mr. Rayner Willis created a favourable impression on this evening by the brilliancy of his rendering of the solo part of Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra.

The concert on the 11th ult. partook of a patriotic character, Mr. Newman having invited the First Battalion Grenadier Guards, which had recently returned from Khartoum. The programme was appropriately provided by British composers, and comprised Mr. Cowen's attractive "Four Old English Dances," Mr. Percy Pitt's clever, but somewhat over-elaborated concert-overture "The Taming of the Shrew," Mr. Edward German's ever-welcome Three Dances from "Henry VIII.," Professor Villiers Stanford's Overture to "Shamus O'Brien," Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture, and "Three Bavarian Dances" from Op. 27 by Mr. Edward Elgar. These are orchestral versions of movements from a choral suite entitled "From the Bavarian Highlands," which comprise six numbers, severally entitled "The Dance," "False Love," "Lullaby," "Aspiration," "On the Alm," "The Marksmen." The composer has arranged the first, third, and last of these for orchestra, and very charming and vivacious pieces they make; so much so, indeed, that they incite a desire to hear the work in its original form.

An interesting orchestral suite by M. Massenet, entitled "Scènes Hongroises," not previously heard in London, opened the performance on the 13th ult. It comprises four movements: "1. Entrée en forme de danse; 2. Intermède; 3. Adieu à la fiancée; 4. Cortège, Benediction nuptiale, Sortie d'Eglise," these titles being fairly justified by the character of the portions of the work they respectively head. Little can be said in commendation of a new overture, "Bellona," composed by Mr. T. H. Frewin. This composer has written some pleasing music, but in this instance appears to us to have overtaxed his powers. A fine performance of Heinrich Hübler's effective Concertstück for four horns and orchestra, the solo instruments being in the hands of Messrs. A. Borsdorf, R. Livesey, T. R. Busby, and A. E. Brain, went far to soothe the agitation caused by the previous offering to the Goddess of War, and a duet for flute and oboe, on themes from Rossini's "William Tell," rendered in a finished manner by Mr. Albert Fransella and Mr. Desire Lalande, also deserves to be recorded.

Distinction was given to the concert on the 14th ult. by the performance of Bach's Second Concerto for solo trumpet, flute, oboe, violin, violoncello, and strings, concerning which Spitta has written: "The plan of the first movement is a model of clearness and simplicity; but an indescribable wealth of episodical invention and the most delicate combination sparkles and gushes forth from all sides. On account of its crystal, clear, and transparent organism, this [second] Concerto is a greater favourite than the first; the feeling, moreover, is throughout of a kind easily entered into. The marvellously beautiful Andante is only soft and tenderly simple, while the first and last movements rush and riot with all the freshness and vigour of youth." These remarks proved justified by the music, which probably was new to the very large majority of those present, for it is doubtful if it had been played before in the metropolis.

Features of the concluding evening were the first performances of two flute solos by Mr. Fransella, one entitled "Invocation," by J. Donjon, for flute and organ; and the other called "Das Waldvöglein" ("Bird of the Forest") for flute and four horns, by F. Doppler. Both pieces possess merit above the average, the horn parts in the latter being written with great skill. The Gomez Clarinet Quartet was heard to much advantage in an arrangement by F. Gomez of the Serenade from a "Fantasia Morisca" by R. Chapi, a Spanish composer, and a long programme was interpreted, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood, in a manner that brought a remarkably successful season to a brilliant conclusion.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The music of Schumann has long occupied a warm place in the heart of Mr. Manns. What more natural, therefore, than that the veteran conductor should inaugurate (on the 9th ult.) the forty-third annual series of the Crystal Palace Saturday concerts with so representative a work as the "Rhenish" Symphony? In listening to its noble strains, it seemed almost impossible to believe that the leading critics of former days could have anathematised a composer so delightfully spontaneous, melodious, and interesting. Herr Rosenthal again displayed his wonderful virtuosity in Xaver Scharwenka's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor (Op. 32) and in Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantasia. The remaining orchestral pieces were Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Mr. Edward German's "English Fantasia on March Themes," originally composed in celebration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, and now performed for the first time in its revised version at this concert. Mdlle. Christianne Andray, a soprano with a well-trained voice, sang songs by Paesiello and Victor Joncières.

At the second concert, on the 15th ult., M. Emile Sauret was the violinist. He played with excellent effect Max Bruch's first Concerto in G minor and Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccio. A Fantasia for the unusual combination of trumpet and organ, by Mr. C. H. Couldery, was a decided novelty. This effective work, in three sections, was most ably interpreted by Mr. Walter Morrow (who played on the trompette-à-pistons in F) and Mr. Walter Hedgcock, the organist of the Crystal Palace. Miss Marie Berg and Mr. Andrew Black were the vocalists, and the remainder of the programme included Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (the dearly-beloved of Sir George Grove, who we are glad to say continues to occupy his usual place in the end gallery of the concert-room) and Mr. Edward Elgar's Triumphal Procession music from his Leeds cantata "Caractacus," conducted by the composer.

Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and the Dead March from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" were familiar features of the programme on the 22nd ult. Madame Blanche Marchesi sang "Elsa's dream," from "Lohengrin," and Stanford's "There is a bower of roses"; and M. Vladimir de Pachmann played Weber's Concertstück and the usual Chopin selection in his own inimitable manner. The novelty was a Pageant March by Dr. Charles Maclean, which calls for no special remark.

RECITALS.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann may be said to have begun the autumn series of recitals when he played a Chopin selection, on the 14th ult., at St. James's Hall. The Russian pianist's interpretations on this occasion were distinguished by exquisite finish, entrancing command of the subtleties of expression, and delightful crispness of execution. Every note seemed struck with intention and to be linked in close association with its fellows, and the pianoforte seemed to sing with many voices. The programme for the most part consisted of Chopin's most happy inspirations, and they have never been interpreted with more manifest enjoyment, earnestness, and skill than on this occasion.

Madame Blanche Marchesi gave distinction to her recital on the 20th ult., at St. James's Hall, by submitting to a London audience, probably for the first time, Bach's cantata "Schlage doch" for solo voice, string quartet, and campanella accompaniment. The bells in the original score are written on the third space in the bass clef and the B above, and unless the bells of the church in which the cantata was sung were utilised, it is difficult to imagine how sufficiently large ones were procurable for such low notes. At St. James's Hall tubular bells were used, which, however, gave sounds an octave higher than the notes written by Bach, with a certain loss of impressiveness. Otherwise the cantata was excellently interpreted by Madame Marchesi and Messrs. Wolff, Kreuz, Hobday, Squire, and Henry Bird, and proved an interesting example of the Leipzig master's genius. Madame Marchesi was also accompanied by the same string quartet in M. Gabriel Fauré's song "En prière." It is scarcely necessary to add that her singing in these and other vocal pieces was remarkable for perfection of voice production and command of tone colour. Several attractive violin solos were contributed by M. Johannes Wolff.

Señor and Señora Carlos Sabrino, who gave a pianoforte and vocal recital on the 17th ult., at the Steinway Hall, are artists worthy of the attention of music-lovers. Señor Sabrino is a pianist who commands the keyboard with agile and insistent fingers, but who never overstrikes his instrument. His renderings of Beethoven's Sonata in D (Op. 28), Schumann's "Papillons," and Chopin's first Scherzo in B minor (Op. 20) were distinguished by a manly style, although with a certain coldness of expression, and the remainder of his selection deserves commendation for its avoidance of hackneyed pieces. A series of "Stimmungs-Skizzen" (Musical Sketches) (Op. 10) by Rebikoff, one of the modern school of Russian composers, in particular proved pleasing and characteristic trifles. Señora Sabrino has a soprano voice of excellent quality, and her singing testified to admirable training and an artistic temperament.

Madame Hanka Schjelderup gave her first pianoforte recital in London, at the Salle Erard, on the 18th ult., when she played a Grieg selection with a verve and power that justified the reputation she has acquired on the Continent. Madame Schjelderup is inclined to exaggerate the eccentricities rather than accentuate the charms of Grieg's music, but her renderings command attention and excite esteem.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Emil Kreuz introduced two new works from his pen at his recital on the 18th ult., at the Steinway Hall, a Ballade for viola solo and a series of six Norwegian Dances (Op. 46, No. 3) for violin solo. The former is somewhat sombre in character and rhapsodical in design, but the latter are full of life and highly pleasing, and they were excellently played by Miss Marie Motto. It may be mentioned that Nos. 1 and 2 of Op. 46 are respectively sets of German and Russian dances. Perhaps it may occur some day to Mr. Kreuz to write a set of English dances.

Only record is required of the vocal and pianoforte recital given on the 19th ult., at St. James's Hall, by Mdlle. Olga Vandero and M. Emile Blanchet. The former sang an artistic selection of songs in an expressive manner, and the latter is a young Swiss pianist of promise.

Mr. Maurice Aubrey gave a vocal recital on the 22nd ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, and sang with taste a number of high-class songs, notably two pleasing lyrics severally entitled "She is far from the land" and "Speak but one word," by Mr. Frank Lambert. Other singers were Miss Hilda Raab, Miss Grace Furniss, Mr. Frederick Addison, and Mr. Lane Wilson, the last-named giving impressive interpretations of Karel Bendl's clever settings of "An old song my mother taught me" and "Sound the pipe and tabor," and two of his own effective arrangements of old English melodies, respectively entitled "Sweet Nelly" and "When dull care." Some violoncello pieces were neatly played by Miss May Mukle, and a feature of the afternoon was the recitation, by Mr. Charles Fry, of "The Building of San Sofia," whose dramatic delivery of the text was enhanced by some new incidental music by Mr. H. M. Higgs, played by the composer. Mr. W. A. Gardner and Mr. Frank Lambert were efficient accompanists.

THE ELDERHORST QUARTET.

When Mr. Arthur Chappell announced his determination to give no Monday "Pops" this autumn, there went up a wail over the alleged degeneration in public taste in no longer supporting these long established entertainments; but, judging by the number of chamber concerts to be given this month and next, string players would seem to have abundant confidence in the existence of widespread appreciation for this delicate and refined branch of music. Foremost amongst such must be placed Herr Elderhorst, who has arranged to give twenty-four chamber concerts on Wednesday afternoons at the Steinway Hall. The first series of eight performances were commenced on the 19th ult., when musicianly interpretations were given of Mozart's fine Quintet in G minor and Brahms's Pianoforte Quintet in F minor, the string players being Messrs. Elderhorst, Kornfeld, Hobday, Tomlinson, and Whitehouse, and the pianist Miss Fanny Davies. The last-named gave a delightful rendering of Schumann's "Drei Fantasiestücke" (Op. 111), and some songs sung by Mr. Whitney Tew completed the selection. An analytical programme was provided, but the comments suggested an inexperienced writer; and those explanatory of the slow movement of Mozart's work must have somewhat puzzled the audience, as what Otto Jahn describes as the expression of "a mind deeply wounded, tormented with self-questionings," was referred to as being "so replete with happiness, that it seems to burst out into smiles and laughter!"

THE SUMMERSCALES MUSICAL COMPETITION.

The seventh musical competition passing under this name was held at Keighley, on the 15th ult. The entries were unusually numerous. A dozen men's voice choirs and nine mixed voice choirs, together with two solo singing sections, brought together about 600 competitors. The solo singing, which was judged by Mr. F. James, was fairly satisfactory. Miss Rudkin gained the soprano prize and Mr. Joseph Clough the bass prize. In the mixed voice competition there were two "heats," five choirs being selected for the second hearing. Three of the choirs had chosen the same piece, Dudley Buck's ever attractive "Hymn to Music." The Saltaire Wesleyan Prize Choir, of which we have not heard much lately, was awarded the first prize. Mr. A. H. Ashworth, as usual, conducted. The second prize fell to the Huddersfield Crosland Moor Wesleyan, under Mr. R. H. Dyson, for an excellent performance of Dr. Rogers's setting of "The Three Fishers." In the men's voice section, Mr. I. Thompson's Nelson Arion Glee Union came first, the Harrogate Prize Glee Society coming second, and the Morley Vocal Union third. These three choirs were remarkably close in the marking. Dr. Henry Coward adjudicated in the choral sections.

Concert Sonata in D major. For the Organ. Composed by Warwick Jordan.

Rameau's Favourite Gavotte in D Arranged by the same composer.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Dr. Warwick Jordan, unlike some modern composers, has been content to follow old and well-tried precedents in the plan of his sonata. The first movement is an Allegro maestoso of a vigorous and animated character, in which imitation has full scope for its effectiveness. The second subject, in the orthodox dominant, is not without that semi-quaver liveliness which characterises the main theme. After the working-out the recapitulation follows in due course, and a succession of bold chords by way of coda completes a movement as concise as it is effective. The second movement, Adagio con molto espressione, in B flat, 12-8 time, is headed "Meditation," and is somewhat in the nature of one of Field's Nocturnes. Pleasant relief is provided by an episode in the dominant key. The Adagio would by itself admirably serve as an attractive voluntary or recital piece. The concluding portion consists of an Introduction (in D minor and major) and a Fugato—the latter consisting of a short diatonic subject, two bars long. Its due development gives place to some brilliant arpeggios, leading to a con fuoco, which concludes the work with stately emphasis. The sonata, dedicated to Mr. W. S. Hoyte, is an honest, straightforward piece of work, which well merits the attention of those organists who possess the technical skill necessary to its proper interpretation, though it is not abnormally difficult.

Rameau's tuneful and well-known Gavotte in D has been effectively arranged by Dr. Warwick Jordan. Apparently in order not to wound the susceptibilities of those to whom the term "Gavotte" might not sound altogether ecclesiastical, a footnote states: "For Church Programmes this may be styled Allegro in D, if desired."

Advent. Sacred Cantata. Words selected by the Rev. H. E. Clayton. Music by J. Varley Roberts.

Behold, I bring you good tidings. Short Anthem for Christmastide. Composed by Myles B. Foster.

Six Short Anthems. By J. Varley Roberts.

[Weekes and Co.]

The above cantata is intended to be sung by the choir and congregation, the former being given solos and choruses and the latter chorals. The solos are designed for tenor and bass voices respectively, and are vocally written. The chorus parts require a well-trained choir, some of the entrances demanding neatness of attack. The music is melodious, but possesses little distinctiveness.

Mr. Foster's anthem opens with a brief passage for a tenor voice and has considerable vivacity. The choral writing is easy to read, but the ensemble would have to be crisp and unanimous for the music to have a good effect.

Dr. Roberts's "Six Short Anthems" have for their text familiar Biblical words, which are set in a flowing and graceful style. Several of them have brief vocal solo passages, and the sixth anthem concludes with a choral fugue which is tersely and vigorously worked out.

A Modern School for the Violin. By August Wilhelmj and James Brown. Section I., Book 1; Section II., Book 1. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

A careful perusal of the first two sections of this School gives an insight into a scheme of training for violin students which is quite unique in its aim and scope. It thoroughly enters into all the essential points of violin playing. Everything of importance is clearly indicated in the most understandable way and is easy to remember and apply, yet it is not overcrowded with details so as to be confusing to a student. Each step forward is simple, and the student is able to carry along all he has learnt before. The all-important question of intonation is treated in quite an original way, and is calculated to develop a full, true tone, ringing and clear. Professor Wilhelmj as a player is remarkable for the quality and sonority of his tone with the most perfect control of every gradation and shade, from the loudest to the softest. The invaluable ear tests given in the easy sections of the school always speak truth to the student, and are evidently the touchstone Wilhelmj has used himself in the development of his own extraordinary powers. That these tests should now be made public through the medium of this School will meet with cordial recognition from violin students and teachers. The high aim of the School is fully set forth in the short preface, which may well be given here.

The main object of the present work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is essential to the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

The equipment of the student of any musical instrument divides itself into two distinct classes—technical studies and pieces. The importance of technical studies in Pianoforte practice has long since been recognised by Professors of the keyboard. In the case of the Violin, however, the average performance of candidates presenting themselves for examination seems to point to a general lack of thoroughness in the study of the Art on its technical side. This being so, it is believed that there is yet room for "A Modern School for the Violin," which is based, even more firmly than is usually the case, upon well-considered educational principles, the result of many years' experience of the needs of both elementary and advanced pupils.

The Work is divided into two principal sections—viz.,

I. Technical Practice.
II. Studies.

Section I. deals exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice, and contains a sufficient supply of material for the gradual and steady development of fingering, bowing, intonation, the positions, &c. The section is issued separately, in six Books, progressively arranged. Incorporated therein will be found all the Scales, Arpeggi, &c., which are needed by Candidates entering for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

Section II. is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in six Books. In point of difficulty the Books are carefully co-ordinated with the similarly numbered Books of Section I., and are intended to be used concurrently with them.

As a sequel to "A Modern School for the Violin," the Authors intend to issue an extensive repertory of Pieces suitable for teaching. The majority of such pieces will be selected from the works of acknowledged Masters, and all of them calculated to encourage the Student and to further the development of a good style.

Each piece will be published separately, with pianoforte accompaniment, and the violin part will be furnished with complete marks for fingering, bowing, and expression.

Section I., Book 1, is purely technical, and the admirably clear introduction, in a few short pithy sentences, gives invaluable simple directions as to position, bowing, and the management of the hands. Section II., Book 1, contains studies accurately graded, and is to be used concurrently with the first book of Section I. The introduction deals with those vital subjects: tone production, intonation, bowing and expression. With the assistance of a good master, and following the course laid down in this School, earnest students may look forward with confidence to a complete mastery of the violin.

The Village Organist. Edited by J. Stainer and F. Cunningham Woods. Books 13 to 16.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

It may perhaps be more satisfactory if we give a general survey of these four books—by no means an unimportant addition to the "Village Organist"—than to treat their contents seriatim. An "Andante tranquillo" by Dr. E. J. Hopkins will at once attract attention for its melodic charm and finished workmanship. Moreover, its freshness is so marked a feature that it might have been written by one sixty years younger than the veteran organist, if that "one" could expect to rival the "father of English organists." M. Alexandre Guilmant contributes two pieces. The first is a characteristic Offertoire in E minor, 9-8 time, with a 3-4 section in the tonic major; the second, a Minuetto in D minor, vigorous and animated. Both these pieces are sure to be found acceptable to English organists, who hold the name of Guilmant in high esteem. A further pair of attractive pieces by another distinguished Parisian organist consists of a "Cantilène religieuse" in C and a Prelude in C minor, these being the compositions of so appreciated a composer in this country as M. Th. Dubois. The remaining original contributions to this quartet of books are all by Englishmen. Mr. Thomas Adams has written a "Marche Solennelle," a "Vesper Melody," and a "Short Fantasia on the hymn-tune Abridge." This last-named piece is an excellent feature, and one that might be still further extended. Congregations always appreciate hearing anything they know; and anyone who provides means for the outgoing voluntary to be founded on a familiar Psalm tune—probably sung during the service—is a benefactor. An "Allegro pomposo," from the experienced pen of Mr. John E. West, two pleasing pieces by Mr. Coleridge-Taylor—an "Elegy" and "Arietta"—as well as two melodious and unaffected movements by Mr. W. G. Ross, are by no means the least attractive features in this four-book instalment. The organist and the ex-organist of Gloucester Cathedral—Mr. A. Herbert Brewer and Mr. C. Lee Williams—follow each other; the first with an Interlude in F and the other with a Diapason movement in C. Other pieces, contributed by Messrs. Oliver O. Brooksbank, E. H. Fellowes, G. J. Elvey, E. F. Rimbault, Adolph Hesse, W. Griffith, and W. A. Montgomery, go to make up a very practical and useful addition to the organist's library. Mention must also be made of the usual quota of arrangements: these include Nos. 9, 22, and 48 of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," ably adapted to the organ by Mr. John E. West; also an Entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, the same composer's Andante (abridged) from the Symphony in C, two movements from the "Occasional" Overture, and a Minuet by Handel, all of these being effectively arranged by Sir John Stainer's co-editor, Mr. F. Cunningham Woods.

Nénuphar. Nocturne for violin (or violoncello), with pianoforte accompaniment. By Herbert Bunning.

Canzone d'Amore. For violin and pianoforte. By Emanuele Móor.

A Night in May. Melody for the pianoforte. By Costantino de Crescenzo.

[G. Ricordi and Co.]

"Nénuphar" is a melodious piece of unpretentious character that can be played at sight by executants of average abilities.

"Canzone d'Amore" calls for some command of the violin and keyboard. It manifestly has for its poetic basis the proverbial love whose course does not run smoothly, and the string part goes high and low, and now and again with no little celerity in search of adequate expression; but it ends peacefully and ethereally high, which is satisfactory—at least, it should be.

"A Night in May" is stormless but not passionless, and pianists will find it dulcet and pleasing and easy of execution.

Irische Volkslieder (Irish popular songs). With German words by Claire von Glümer. Arranged for a medium voice with pianoforte accompaniments by Ernst von Stockhausen. [Breitkopf and Härtel.]

The many English vocalists who apparently prefer to sing in any language but their own now have an opportunity of delivering Irish ballads in German. The translation preserves much of the force and character of the original text and has been cleverly fitted to the music, which has been carefully edited by Herr Ernst von Stockhausen. The selection embraces the best-known ballads, and is comprised in four books, three of which are arranged for a medium voice, and the fourth consists of six well-known ditties arranged as duets. It should be added that the English text is also given, so that for once justice has been done to Ireland.

The Seven Kids. A fairy tale for children. By Adelheid Wette. Incidental music by Engelbert Humperdinck. [Magdeburg: Heinrichshofen's Verlag.]

The phenomenal success of "Hänsel und Gretel" has indissolubly connected Herr Humperdinck's name with fairy tales, and his happy treatment of these stories which never grow old naturally gives rise to considerable expectations when he comes forward as a composer of light music. "The Seven Kids" can scarcely be compared with "Hänsel und Gretel," for it only consists of six numbers, and the work may be adequately performed in the Theatre Royal Back Drawing-room. The characters are a goat, seven kids, and a wolf; and the action commences by Mrs. Goat leaving home to search for food and bidding the kids keep the door bolted until she returns. Shortly after her departure the wolf arrives and endeavours to persuade the kids to let him in by pretending to be their mother. They, however, demand to see his paws, and when he shows them they detect the impostor, as they are black instead of white. But Mr. Wolf, like another person of evil intentions, is persevering; he pays a visit to the miller and gets his paws covered with flour, which perfectly convinces the giddy kids that their respected mamma has returned, the result being that the kids become part of the wolf. The voracious monster has, however, eaten hastily—in fact, he has bolted the kids whole, and when Mrs. Goat returns she sets them free by the pointed application of her scissors. Out of consideration for the wolf's feelings she fills up the vacuum with stones, which seem to be equally satisfying to the wolf's appetite, saving that it makes him feel thirsty, and with fatal results, for when he goes to the brook the weight of the stones causes him to lose his balance and come to an unexpected end; whereupon Mrs. Goat moralises:

Oh, you greedy gormandiser,
What a pity you weren't wiser.
Mr. Wolf, so false and sly,
In the river now you lie!

The first song is sung by one of the kids and is very characteristic of Herr Humperdinck's folk-song style. The second number is sung by the wolf and is written for baritone or alto and is more declamatory. This is followed by a lively two-part song for the kids. The goat heralds her approach by singing a measure in minuet time, the wolf has a brief monologue concerning his internal feelings, and the work is concluded with a gay chorus by the kids. An excellent English translation of the German text has been provided by Miss Constance Bache, and the brief dialogue between the vocal numbers could be easily committed to memory.

The Office of the Holy Communion. Set to music in the key of E flat. By Charles Macpherson. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Charles Macpherson is one of our most gifted and promising young musicians, and this setting of the Communion Service witnesses to his excellent training and musicianship. The composer has taken a very earnest view of his subject. The music has, in a measure, affinity to the old Italian school of Palestrina, and is characterised by great nobility and loftiness of conception. This is at once noticeable in the Kyrie, which is somewhat severe but decidedly impressive. The Credo is opened by the choir in unison with a phrase to which frequent recurrence is made, and is of a character which at once imprints itself on the memory. A brief interlude prepares the way for the section "Who for us men," which is very expressively set. The choral writing goes into six parts in some of the chords at the delivery of the sentence "And the third day," and the initial phrase is allied to the sentence "I believe in the Holy Ghost." The Sanctus possesses considerable distinctiveness, and is written for the most part on a pedal bass. The Benedictus is manifestly intended to be opened by a quartet of soloists, whose phrases are subsequently repeated by the choir, the number being closed by a vigorous treatment of the word "Hosanna." The music allied to the Agnus Dei possesses great beauty of a tranquil character, especially at the close. The Gloria begins in a vigorous fashion, contains much clever contrapuntal writing, and concludes with a fugue in four parts which is developed in a terse and masterly style.

Cinderella. An Operetta for Schools and Classes. Words by Shapcott Wensley. Music composed by Georges Jacobi. (Novello's School Series. Edited by W. G. McNaught.) [Novello and Company, Limited.]

"Cinderella" is the queen of fairy stories, and its charm and humour is set forth in attractive fashion in this operetta. It consists of two acts comprising three scenes, the latter severally being a kitchen, an apartment in the Prince's palace, and the garden of Cinderella's house. There are nine principal parts, that of the heroine, her two sisters, somewhat satirically named Patience and Charity, the all-powerful Fairy Godmother, the very necessary Prince, the no less needful Papa, a courtier (Lady Guy), a short spoken part, and an Attendant, which is also a spoken part. The familiar but ever fresh story is told by these characters in speech and song in a bright and humorous manner, the dialogue being commendably terse and easy to remember. Mr. Jacobi's music, as may be expected from so practised a musician in dance rhythms, is full of life and gaiety, and opens with an overture, tempo di Minuetto, of attractive and graceful character. It is followed by a two-part chorus, a considerable portion of which is in unison for the voices. This is succeeded by some lively conversation between Charity and Patience, of an uncharitable and impatient nature, which terminates in a duet sung by the sisters, who subsequently dance a gavotte. The entrance of Papa leads to some exercises in deportment and short solos for the father and his eldest daughters. Cinderella being left alone also gives expression to her feelings in a song, which is answered by the fairies calling behind the scenes and by the entrance of the Fairy Godmother, who arrives with a troop of white fairies who sing some charming choruses, and the act closes with the departure of Cinderella for the all-eventful ball. The second act begins with a repetition of the opening bars of the work, transposed from the key of A to that of C, and is continued by a melodiously written duet for Charity and Patience and chorus of the courtiers in praise of the Prince, who, when he enters, sings a lively song of martial character. A Lady of the Court leads off another chorus in which she and the courtiers gossip about Cinderella and her fascination of the Prince. The fairies also sing a warning song, and the scene closes with the flight of Cinderella. The last scene opens with some amusing dialogue, the Prince with his courtiers enter as strolling minstrels, and justify their appearance by singing a dainty ditty. The Prince himself has brought the slipper, and, while it is being tried on, more choruses are sung interspersed with dialogue, ending with a jubilant choral number, "Sweet Cinderella, all joy be thine," which concludes one of the best examples of this excellent series.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Our musical season commenced with a week of popular concerts organised by Mr. D. French Davis, the well-known harpist, conductor, and bandmaster, given in the Town Hall from the 3rd to the 8th ult. He had under his baton a well-balanced orchestra of forty-five excellent performers, with Mr. Fred. Ward as leader. The programmes were of a distinctly popular character, but the venture proved a heavy financial failure. On the 10th ult. Mr. Davis transferred his orchestra to the Curzon Hall, where he entered upon a five weeks' season of similar concerts. Madame Adelina Patti appeared at Messrs. Harrison's first concert of the current series on Monday, the 10th ult., with her customary success.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society inaugurated its season with a performance of Berlioz's "Faust," given in the Town Hall on the 13th ult., under Dr. Swinnerton Heap's conductorship, the principal parts being entrusted to the safe keeping of Miss Rosina Hammacott, Mr. Charles Saunders (the Australian tenor), Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Andrew Black. Dr Heap took the tempi much faster than is customary, which certainly enhanced the colouring of some of the scenes, but marred others. The Easter Hymn and the fugue on Brander's song were superbly given by the choir, but the scene in Pandemonium, preceded by that terrible ride terminating in the abyss, lacked dramatic power. On the other hand, such numbers as the Rakoczy March, the orchestral ballet of the Sylphs, and the dance of Will-o'-the-Wisps proved a veritable triumph for the orchestra. I do not think it is generally known that Berlioz, by way of a joke, gave it out that the song "The King of Thule" was a hitherto unknown song by Carl Maria von Weber, found among his papers. It was accepted by everybody as a composition of Weber's, and some Germans of the old school (la vieille roche) even declared no Frenchman could have composed so tender and simple a song.

The Birmingham Sunday School Union held its forty-eighth annual musical festival in the Town Hall, on the 11th, 12th, 14th, and 15th ult. The choir, numbering several hundred voices, was conducted by Mr. Thomas Facer. Mr. C. W. Perkins officiated at the organ.

Mr. Max Mossel opened his third season of Drawing-Room concerts with an excellent chamber concert, given in the handsome Grosvenor Rooms of the Grand Hotel, on the 20th ult. The principal selection consisted of Gabriel Fauré's magnificent Pianoforte and String Quartet in C minor (Op. 15), heard here for the first time. The programme opened with a brilliant performance of Brahms's Sonata in A major (Op. 100). The performers were Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg (pianoforte), Mr. Max Mossel (violin), Mr. Emil Ferrir (viola), and Mr. J. C. Hock (violoncello). The vocal numbers were assigned to Mr. Kennerley Rumford.

The destruction by fire of Colston Hall, to which reference was made in the October number of The Musical Times, has had a rather serious effect upon music in Bristol. A series of concerts fixed by the Choral Society, to be held in the destroyed building, has been cancelled, although the members have decided to continue rehearsals. It is probable that the Society will give a performance in London in April. Up to the present nothing has been absolutely decided regarding the musical festival which should take place next autumn; but there seems to be little likelihood of its being held, mainly through the destruction of the hall and the procrastination of the company (for which there has been reason) in determining whether or not they will rebuild it.

Few events have taken place during the past month. The chief of these have been a ballad and part-song concert given by the Meister Glee Singers, a miscellaneous concert by the Bristol Post Office Band, Miss Mary Lock's first chamber concert of the season, and a violin and pianoforte recital by Mr. Pecskai and Miss Charlotte Davies, which call for no comment.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Palestrina's "Missa Papæ Marcelli" was performed as a special function at St. Teresa's Church, Clarendon Street, on the 16th ult., under the direction of Mr. Vincent O'Brien. The choir, specially formed for the occasion, consisted of the boys of St. Mary's Christian Schools, who have on several occasions been victorious in the Dublin School Music Competitions and whose training at the hands of Mr. O'Brien has called forth much admiration, with a male-voice choir also trained by the same gentleman for this special occasion. The historic Mass was rendered in an unexceptionable manner, and the "Proper," consisting mainly of Gregorian, showed the conductor's good schooling in this often inadequately mastered subject.

Mr. Robert Dwyer's annual concert took place on the 20th ult., at the Rotunda, Dublin. The band organised by Mr. Dwyer may be said to have been the principal feature of the concert, which included in its programme the Overture to "Figaro," Beethoven's cantata "In praise of Music," Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and a miscellaneous second part. The principal artists were Mrs. R. Dwyer, Miss Elsie Connolly, Miss Marie Frengley, Mr. Dan Jones, and Mr. H. S. Kavanagh. Mr. Dwyer conducted.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The interesting machinery set in motion several months ago on behalf of the Choral and Orchestral Union has, so far, been turned on to excellent purpose. Hitherto the scheme has found itself in sore distress, financial and otherwise; but the united efforts on the part of all concerned have, however, wrought wonders. For the first time, moreover, a ladies' committee has been secured, numbering, amongst others, the Princess Louise, the Countess of Eglinton, the Countess of Glasgow, Lady Blythswood, Lady Kelvin, and others. At the meeting of guarantors and others interested in the concerts, held under the presidency of Lord Provost Richmond, on the 14th ult., the prospectus was submitted. The orchestral works to be performed will include familiar examples of Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Tschaïkowsky, Brahms, and A. C. Mackenzie. Humperdinck's new "Moorish Rhapsody" and Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in A minor are also to be heard, and an overture by Mr. Wilhelm Bruch, the new conductor of the Scottish Orchestra, finds a place in the arrangements.

Mr. Allan Macbeth, the Principal of the Athenæum School of Music, opened the course of weekly lectures, recitals, &c., on the afternoon of the 6th ult. His text, "Musical Progress," was thoroughly well treated—so well, indeed, that he was requested to deliver the address to the Tonic Sol-fa Association.

M. de Pachmann's recital at the Queen's Rooms, on the 7th ult., again showed his excellence in his own special sphere, and, as of yore, he had the kindly reception which is always given to an old friend.

The Glasgow Society of Musicians announces a concert for the evening of the 15th inst. It is well worthy of substantial support, inasmuch as it will be given in aid of the Benevolent Fund connected with the Society's operations. Miss Marie Brema comes North for the occasion, as does also Dr. A. L. Peace, an old Glasgow friend.

On the 15th ult. the first students' concert in connection with the Glasgow Athenæum was given, when, amongst many other attractions, the programme contained a new ballad by Principal Macbeth.

The Springburn Choral Society has taken up Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" for rehearsal during the coming season.

The Society held its first musical evening on the 18th ult., when an interesting programme, compiled by Messrs. Patterson and Biggar, attracted a good and representative audience. The programme included Beethoven's Trio (Op. 1, No. 2) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, several well-known glees, and a new song, "Winsome Mary," by Mr. Alexander Patterson.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The first concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 11th ult. Of the programme itself little need be said, the regular forces of the Society being engaged, according to tradition, upon such familiar works as Beethoven's Symphony (No. 4) in B flat and Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," the chief exception to custom being Scharwenka's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, in which the solo part was admirably played by Mr. Rosenthal.

The Orchestral Society gave a Ladies' concert on the 15th ult., when Mr. Rodewald's fine band proved to be in the best possible training in Schubert's Symphony (No. 9) in C major, Dvorák's Symphonic Variations, and Tschaikowsky's "Casse Noisette" Suite. Mr. Plunket Greene was the vocalist and sang well, to the delightful accompaniment of Mr. Welsing. A Richter concert was given on the 22nd ult., with the usual Richter programme.

The first concert of the Sunday Society served to introduce an orchestra which, if somewhat reduced in numbers, proved to be the best yet heard at these performances; the fifty players engaged being, as usual, conducted by Mr. W. I. Argent. The initial appearance of the new chorus of the Society was announced for the 30th ult., in Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

The choral side of art seems at last to be looking up in this district. In addition to the new departure of the Sunday Society before alluded to, largely attended meetings of the New Brighton Tower Choral Society have been held under Mr. Granville Bantock, Handel's "Messiah" being laid under contribution with such satisfactory results as augur well for the success of the experiment. In the same district Mr. J. W. Harries has undertaken the direction of St. Mary's Choral Society and commenced rehearsing Gaul's "Holy City." At Birkenhead Mr. Appleyard is rehearsing Sullivan's "Light of the World," and at Waterloo the same conductor has in hand Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Dvorák's "St. Ludmila." Rehearsals have been commenced by the Kirkdale Choral Society, but no information has come to hand as to the works undertaken. Mr. Crossley is preparing Cowen's "St. John's Eve," at Newton-le-Willows, and is announced to make his first appearance as a conductor in Liverpool with the Musical Society on the 15th inst., when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given. At Warrington the same gentleman is rehearsing Haydn's "Creation" for performance on the 9th inst. At Southport, Mr. H. Hudson promises Cowen's "Ruth" and Handel's "Messiah" this side of Christmas, and Mr. Clarke is preparing Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Sullivan's "Light of the World."

At the Liverpool College of Music an interesting performance of music of the 16th—18th centuries took place on the 17th ult., when, among other things, Carissimi's "Gaudeamus" and Leonardo Leo's fine "Dixit Dominus" were heard for the first time in this city. Thanks are due to Messrs. Novello and Co., Limited, for the loan of orchestral parts and information as to the same from their inexhaustible resources in such matters.

Chamber music has been represented by the first of Mr. Theodore Lawson's concerts at St. George's Hall, when the Risegari Quartet and Mr. Pachmann were welcomed by a host of those who delight in the most refined aspect of art. For the second concert the Brodsky Quartet were engaged. The Schiever Quartet announce another of their long established series of recitals at the concert-room of the College of Music, and in the same locality Messrs. Courvoisier and Welsing are giving on three evenings the whole of Beethoven's sonatas for violin and pianoforte, with gratifying results. At St. George's Hall, Messrs. Ross and Moore, ensemble pianists, promised a recital for the 27th ult.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Dr. Watson had the honour of leading the way and prefacing the busy musical season to which we are looking forward, by the excellent performance, on the 12th ult., of the Vocal Society, now numbering some sixty voices, and in its thirty-second year. Both the choral and solo singing were very enjoyable. The demolition of the Gentlemen's concert-room necessitated removal to the handsome hall of the Athenæum, infinitely the best in this city for chamber or refined choral music; and Miss Alicia Jephson was wise in securing it for her first reception of her friends on the 24th ult. The banquet-room of the Town Hall, selected for the Gentlemen's concert of the 17th ult., is neither good for sound nor, even when brilliantly lighted, free from a decidedly sombre effect, owing to the darkness of its very handsome stone-work. The first of the Gentlemen's concerts was given there on the 17th ult. Mr. Pyne's recitals attract, every Saturday evening, more lovers of organ music than could, perhaps, be found assembled in any other city hall in the kingdom.

Mr. Carl Fuchs's subscription meetings at the Schiller Anstalt grow in favour. No violoncellist now before the public plays with more finish and with purer tone, and Mr. Fuchs displays admirable tact in the arrangement of his programmes. He was assisted, on the 15th ult., by many of his colleagues of the Royal College, Mr. Dayas playing the twenty-four Variations and Fugue (Op. 24) of Brahms; and, joined by Miss Néruda, the well-known Variations of Schumann for two claviers, which were rendered according to their original plan with accompaniment for horn and two violoncellos, Leo Smith, the clever young pupil of Mr. Fuchs, being associated with his instructor. Miss Néruda also played, with Mr. Fuchs, Brahms's Trio (Op. 40), with all her customary clearness and modesty of assertion, Mr. Paersch giving the horn parts as perhaps he only can. The singing of Madame Brema was clever, but somewhat unduly vigorous and declamatory for a moderate-sized room.

The firm hold which Mr. Brodsky's quartet recitals have upon the public was shown by the large audience assembled on Wednesday evening, the 19th ult., in the Y.M.C.A., attentively listening to quiet music in spite of the noises made in adjoining rooms which reminded one of the game of bowls indulged in by Rip van Winkle's old men of the mountains. Schumann's Quartet (No. 3, Op. 41) and Brahms's Quintet (Op. 111) do not represent their composers in their happiest or most connected moods. The performance was excellent; but these works lack consistency of design, and are extremely fragmentary and kaleidoscopic both in subject and treatment. Between them, however, came the "Kreutzer" Sonata of Beethoven, full of purpose, power, and melody, interpreted by Mr. Brodsky and Mr. Frederick Dawson, whose superb playing demanded a triple recall and excited a strong desire for a pianoforte solo. Surprise has, by those not behind the scenes, frequently and naturally been expressed that Mr. Dawson—so popular elsewhere—should, after his early and great success at the Hallé concerts some years ago, have been so long absent from Manchester; and Mr. Brodsky did well in securing his services for the opening concert of this winter series, and still better in showing his unrestrained pleasure at the masterly playing of his young English colleague.

Upon the very angry controversy raging here about the future of the Hallé concerts it is not my business to animadvert; but the crowding of every part of the Free Trade Hall, on the 20th ult., and the ovation—so prolonged and enthusiastic that Mr. Cowen appeared almost to shrink from it—showed the excited feeling of the immense audience. The first of the twenty programmes which Mr. Cowen has to prepare for this winter season, and generally with only one rehearsal for each, entirely proved the excellence of the orchestra. The now well-known variations which form the conclusion of Tschaïkowsky's Suite in G afforded ample opportunity of testing the qualifications of each section of the band and of its chief soloists. The first movement of the suite contains several graceful themes cleverly treated; but the wisdom of the frequent detaching of the Air varied from the second and third movements was clearly proved. The exquisitely delicate handling of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony brought a welcome relief after the extreme Russian vigour of some parts of the suite. Miss Leonara Jackson was new to us, but her next appearance will be warmly welcomed. She triumphed easily over the difficulties of Vieuxtemps's Fourth, so-called, Concerto and of the Chaconne of Bach. Her tone is delightfully pure and her intonation perfect, even in octave passages (generally so trying to the listener as well as to the violinist), and her bowing is replete with vigour and grace. Miss Clara Butt selected Gluck's "Divinités du Styx," and two songs from the immense portfolio of the conductor, including the little gem "For a dream's sake," so charmingly simple and expressive.

Two such notable concerts given on consecutive evenings in the same hall, and by rival aspirants for the honour of appointment as permanent conductor of that orchestral organisation which, for a long series of years, has played so important a part in the musical life of the North of England, unavoidably challenge a directness of comparison which, usually, it is advisable to avoid. During the years when Dr. Richter's annual visit, to some old-fashioned people, seemed to be somewhat of an intrusion on the domain of Sir Charles Hallé, it was eagerly looked forward to by those able to take a broader and higher view of the duties and responsibilities of the leaders in artistic matters, and to perceive the advantage resulting from such a stimulus periodically crossing our placid life; and, whatever may be the result of the negotiations, which, for some time past, have been stirring the minds of very many outside the circle of avowedly musical men, and, on the 21st ult., drew to the Free Trade Hall an audience of enthusiastic demonstrators not usually found within its walls, Dr. Richter will always be honoured here as one who, although an avowed partisan of a special school of composition, is eminently qualified for the distinguished position which he occupies among the world's notable conductors. It is unnecessary to say that the performance of works selected for this year's tour, nightly performed in each town visited, and containing no positive novelty, was so highly finished as to be beyond criticism, except that the unrestrained fierce "splendour of the brass" was not grateful to all ears, and the programme was so arranged as to render the moderate quietness of the Tristan "Vorspiel und Liebestod" a welcome relief, in spite of the wearisome reiteration of its not too attractive little themes. But such lengthened preparation and frequent performance, although customary on the Continent, are not, under ordinary circumstances, possible in England. In the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschäikowsky, in one important detail Dr. Richter has, since he was here in October, 1897, slightly modified the form of the slowly descending peal of funeral bells—represented mainly by the plucked strings—and the reading has been brought more into accordance with the impressive muffled sounds which Mr. Cowen ordered at the two performances of the work given in the early part of last winter.

It was just as inevitable to avoid comparison of the forces under their control as of the conductors themselves. The Hallé orchestra contains some who grew old under a chief who was very considerate of their long service, and they could not honourably be displaced without some recognition of their claims. The London strings have an enviable youthful vigour and precision of attack which may not be matched except by some reinforcement in that department of our local orchestra, which even in Dr. Richter's band was occasionally unable to compete with the brazen tubes. But no apology whatever is needed for our wood-wind, which has, for purity of tone, for adequate force, and for perfect balance and blending long had an unsurpassed and thoroughly deserved reputation.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Two only of the important concerts given during the past month call for notice. On the 17th ult. the first of the Harrison Concerts took place in Olympia, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Of this it is only necessary to say that Madame Adelina Patti was the principal attraction. The other concert was given on the 19th ult., also in Olympia, by the Richter orchestra, under the auspices of the Newcastle Chamber Music Society, when a typical Richter programme was admirably performed.

It may be mentioned that the following works are in rehearsal and will be given during the season: Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union, Handel's "Samson"; Sunderland Philharmonic Society, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," and Verdi's "Stabat Mater"; South Shields Choral Society, Parts I. and II. of Haydn's "Creation," Somervell's "The Forsaken Merman," and Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride"; Middlesbrough Musical Union, Handel's "Samson," Cowen's "Ode to the Passions," S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," and Edward Elgar's "Banner of St. George"; Bishop Auckland Musical Society, Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Gounod's "Redemption" was performed in St. Mary's Church, Sheffield, on the 10th ult. The chorus numbered 120 voices, and the performance was directed by Mr. J. A. Rodgers. The principals were Master Eddie Lowe, who sang the soprano music with admirable taste; Messrs. A. Dawes, J. Lycett, and several members of the choir of the church. The choruses were particularly well rendered. "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," the chorus of priests, and the concluding "Hymn of the Apostles," with its imposing chain of choruses and quartets, were among the best sung numbers in the work. The popularity of the series of oratorio performances was proved by the crowded state of the large church.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was performed in the Music Hall, Surrey Street, on the 17th ult. The concert was promoted by the St. Cecilia Musical Society and the Choral Union, the proceeds being in aid of the widow of the late Mr. A. Bayles, who for a number of years was a prominent member of both societies. An admirable performance was directed by Mr. S. Suckley, the effect of the augmented chorus being very full and striking. The massive choral writing in "St. Paul" afforded full scope for the resources of so large a body of singers. "O Great is the depth" and "Rise up, arise," were sung with all necessary fulness and vigour, and the chorals were broadly sung. The principals were Miss Eva Rich, Miss Amy Skerritt, Mr. R. Thompson, and Mr. J. Lycett. Mr. S. Suckley conducted, and Messrs. J. H. Parkes and Clough did good work as leader and organist respectively.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Music in Yorkshire is at present more of a prospective than of a retrospective nature. The occurrence of the Leeds Festival has, as usual, somewhat retarded the opening of the winter season; but during the last half of October a few concerts have taken place that deserve a record. Huddersfield, where concerts are more plentiful than select, began its season of subscription concerts as early as September 27, but the programmes of both the opening concert and its successor, on the 11th ult., do not call for special remark. On the former occasion the band of the Royal Engineers, conducted by Mr. Sommer, with Madame Inverni as vocalist, supplied the programme, and on the latter the clever Meister Glee Singers, always a safe draw at Huddersfield, delighted a crowded audience with their finished performances. Mrs. Trust materially enhanced the artistic value of the programmes by her refined singing of well-chosen songs, and Madame Gomez's unaffected methods also won deserved approval. Mr. Aldo Antonietti was the violinist and Mr. Hulland the solo pianist and accompanist. On the 15th ult. the Huddersfield Choral Society gave Berlioz's "Faust," which has long been one of its stock pieces. The Society's chorus, which comprises some of the very best choral material in Yorkshire—and therefore in England—sang admirably, and formed the distinguishing feature of the concert. A praiseworthy attempt had been made to strengthen the band, never a strong point at these concerts, but its performance still left room for improvement. The soloists were Madame Ella Russell, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, who proved hardly strong enough for the part of Faust; Mr. Watkin Mills, powerful and safe as ever; and Mr. William Thornton, a capital representative of Brander. Mr. John Bowling conducted. Still another Huddersfield concert falls to be chronicled, that of the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, whose season opened on the 18th ult., when Mr. Ibeson conducted a varied programme of concerted vocal music, and the principal vocalists were Madame Lizzie Burgess and Mr. Charles Knowles.

On the 17th and 18th ult. Mr. H. A. Fricker, the recently-appointed organist at the Leeds Town Hall, gave the Leeds public its first opportunity of gauging his merits as a soloist. At the festival the nature of his work made it impossible to judge his prowess as a solo player, and as the repairs and additions to the Town Hall organ are even now not completed, he has not yet been able to assume his official duties. On the 17th he played in a Leeds chapel and on the following day in St. Aidan's Church, where there is a fine instrument that, for once in a way, is not "entombed," as Sir Walter Parratt puts it, but is allowed a chance of speaking. Mr. Fricker, in a well selected and arranged programme, showed himself to be a thoroughly accomplished organist, with genuine musical feeling besides. In passage playing he has a nimble finger and elastic touch, his phrasing is finished, and his pedalling delightfully neat. Altogether he is well qualified to revive the somewhat tarnished glories of the only subsidised concerts in Leeds.

At Bradford there was what is commonly known as a "Patti" concert on the 19th ult., and on the 22nd the Bradford Permanent Orchestra opened its season with a programme of Mr. Cowen's compositions, which were conducted by the composer. A highly creditable performance of his "Idyllic" Symphony was the chief feature of the concert, though, perhaps, the greatest enjoyment was derived from the "Fairyland" Ballet and the set of old English Dances, both exceedingly happy illustrations of Mr. Cowen's graceful gifts. The vocalists were Miss Evangeline Florence and Mr. George Uttley.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

There has been nothing of any particular interest in the performances of the Opéra during the past few weeks, but the rehearsals of M. Vidal's new lyric drama "Gauthier d'Aquitaine" have been actively proceeded with, and the long looked-for première may be expected to take place very shortly. Another event of considerable interest will be the first performance here of Berlioz's "La Prise de Troie," the first part of "Les Troyens," which is now in course of being mounted. Performances of "Die Walküre" will likewise be resumed before long.

The inauguration of the new theatre of the Opéra Comique has been definitely fixed for December 1. M. Carré, the director, promises the production during the season of the following works—viz., "La Bohème," Puccini; "Beaucoup de Bruit pour Rien," Puget; "Les Pêcheurs de St. Jean," Widor; "La Coupe Enchantée," Pierné; Massenet's "Cendrillon," and Saint-Saëns's "Javotte," besides the revival of the last-named composer's "Proserpine" and Beethoven's "Fidelio." Truly an ambitious programme. Pending the opening of the new house, performances of the pieces on the old répertoire will take place at the theatre of the Château d'Eau, at reduced prices.

The recent production at the Théâtre de la Republique of a new four-act opera, "Lovelace," the libretto of which is founded upon Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe," should be of interest to your readers. The novel was immensely popular in France, as well as in England, at the time of its appearance, particularly with literary men; Diderot placing it amongst the classics of his predilection. The present is, however, the first instance of its being utilized for the French lyrical stage. The librettists, MM. Jules Barbier and Paul de Choudens, have made a very fairly effective dramatic whole of the few incidents selected from the voluminous original, and M. Henri Hirschmann, already favourably known as the composer of a one-act opera brought out last year at the Opéra Comique, has wedded some unequal, but, on the whole, not ineffective music thereto.

M. Lamoureux announced the resumption of his excellent concerts on the 23rd ult., when an entire act of "Tristan und Isolde" was to be produced. On the same day M. Colonne's concerts were announced to re-commence. The great hall of the Châtelet has been newly decorated, while the orchestral podium has undergone some material alterations so as to diminish the sonority of the brass instruments. The first series of the Colonne concerts this season is to be devoted to a kind of résumé of the concerts given by this renowned Institution since its foundation—viz., 604 concerts in all, comprising the performance of 1,204 works by 198 different composers.

As regards our leading executive artists, many of them are busily employed, as yet, in the fulfilment of engagements abroad. Mr. Harold Bauer is appearing just now in concerts in Spain, and will go to Germany and the Scandinavian countries during the present month; the excellent pianist M. Falcke is likewise in Germany. M. Geloso, the violinist, has been engaged by Herr Mottl to play at Carlsruhe, M. Dezo Lederer is engaged at Monte Carlo, M. Henri Marteau is touring in Russia, and M. Abbiste, the violoncellist, will spend the entire season in the dominions of the Czar.

No definite appointment has yet been made with regard to the professorship of harmony at the Conservatoire, vacated by the death of M. Barthe, but it is thought most likely that M. Samuel Rousseau will be nominated for the post.

Great activity is being displayed on all sides just now in musical quarters to organise performances and arrange programmes for the present season, which bids fair to be a brilliant one.

The Worcester Festival.

The forty-first annual meeting of the Worcester County Musical Association was held from September 26 to 30, in Worcester, Mass., under the direction of Mr. George W. Chadwick, of Boston. The following artists took part: Madame Johanna Gadski, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Miss Sara Anderson, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mrs. Carl Alves, Miss Mina Kellogg, Miss Marie Downey, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, Mr. Evan Williams, Mr. Gwylym Miles, Mr. Mackenzie Gordon, Mr. Dudley Buck, jun., Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich (organist), and Mr. Ovide Musin (violinist). The chorus numbered about 400, and the orchestra was from Boston; Franz Kneisel being concert-master and assistant-conductor. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Parker's "Hora Novissima," Chadwick's "Lily Nymph," Grieg's "Olaf Trygvasson," Mrs. Beach's "The Rose of Avontown," and the following orchestral numbers: Brahms's Second Symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture, Raff's Symphony "Im Walde," Haydn's Symphony in G major, Massenet's suite "Les Erinnyes," Lalo's "Russian" Concerto, Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel" Overture, Bach's "Pastoral" Symphony and Gavotte in E, Grieg's "Two Northern Melodies" for strings, Rheinberger's Concerto for organ, strings, and horns, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture.

This Festival Association in Worcester is a fair gauge of our musical taste, because it is held in a part of the country where the foreign element is comparatively small and, as far as a mere observer can discern, it is a natural growth out of the old custom of getting people together to sing simple sacred music. Fifty years ago in New England it was quite a common thing for church singers to unite in a sort of festival, when familiar hymns and anthems would be sung. Out of this, without any infusion of German ideas and customs, has grown the present Association. In Cincinnati, on the contrary, the festival is the direct outcome of the Saengerfest.

Worcester is a city of about 50,000 inhabitants. It is typically New England; without many evidences of artistic feeling in its public or private buildings, it is prosperous, clean, and well governed. It is but an hour's journey from Boston, and has felt something of the artistic impulse which is now so strong in the larger city. For thirty-one years the festival chorus was under the direction of Karl Zerrahn. Mr. Chadwick succeeded him this year.

In criticising the recent performances at Worcester, one has to bear in mind the changes that have taken place in the chorus—many new voices having been admitted—and the fact that they were under a new conductor. Many of the performances were very good indeed, notably that of "Hora Novissima" (which was sung a year ago at the festival).

The festival has now gone through two stages of its existence successfully: first, the one mentioned in referring to its beginnings; and second, the one in which great solo artists dominated everything and people went simply to see and hear famous singers or players. It is now on a firm artistic basis, having for its object the production of great music by intelligent and capable performers, and, judging by the audiences this year, the public are ready to support the present plan.

Of the individual performers, Miss Aus der Ohe, Madame Gadski, Miss Stein, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies scored the greatest successes. Miss Aus der Ohe's playing was both intelligent and masterly. Mr. Goodrich is a young Boston organist who has but recently returned from Germany, and is now a very successful teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. The financial results of the festival were, I believe, satisfactory.

Parker's "St. Christopher" is to be performed this season, by the Western Choral Union, at Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Louis.

Surette's Thanksgiving anthem "Let God arise" was very successfully sung at St. Andrew's, New York City (Mallison Randall, organist), and at St. James's (Walter Henry Hall, organist), and is down in several other choir lists in New York, Philadelphia, New Haven, and other cities, where peace celebrations are to be held in celebration of the close of the Spanish-American war.

Sunday, the 9th ult., being the first Sunday after the return of the Guards from the Soudan, was observed as a day of special Thanksgiving, and also as the Harvest Festival at the Royal Military (Guards) Chapel, Wellington Barracks. In the evening a special musical service was held, under the direction of the Precentor, Mr. Richard Lemaire. The orchestra was composed of musicians drawn from the three bands of the Brigade, and the professional Sunday evening choir was on this occasion augmented by the Chelsea and Battersea Choral Society, of which Mr. Lemaire is the conductor. The Canticles were sung to Stainer in A, and the anthem was Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." The effect produced by the fine band and chorus was very grand, and a special word of praise must be given to Master Harry Evans, the solo boy of the Chapel, for his artistic singing. The Chapel was crowded in every part, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon S. M. Taylor, Precentor of St. Saviour's, Southwark. It may not be generally known that a musical service is held every Sunday evening, at 6 p.m., at this Chapel and that the public are admitted without tickets.

The Bow and Bromley Choir and Orchestra, of 160 performers, gave a performance of "Judas Maccabæus" at the People's Palace, Mile End, on the 22nd ult., before an immense audience. The principals were Miss Louise Burns, a young but thoroughly experienced and trained singer; Madame Eliza Thomas, Mr. Branscombe, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Miss Gwynne Kimpton, of the Guildhall School, led the band, and Mr. H. F. Ellingford, of the Royal College of Music, played the organ. The choral performance fully maintained the high reputation the choir has gained in the East of London. The chorus "We never will bow down" was encored. Dr. McNaught conducted. It is gratifying to hear that all the oratorio performances given recently at the People's Palace have been attended by large and enthusiastic audiences.

The summer season of grand concerts at the Alexandra Palace was concluded on September 24, when Sir Arthur Sullivan's popular "Golden Legend" was given on an extensive scale, under the able direction of Mr. Henry J. Baker, with the result that the performance was one of the greatest successes of the season. The orchestra, numbering over 100 performers, and the large choir of the Alexandra Palace Choral Society rendered the work in every way most satisfactorily. The evening hymn "O Gladsome Light" was persistently re-demanded. The solos were excellently sung by Miss Thudichum, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Sidwell Jones, and Mr. Charles Copland. Mr. Alexander Griffin presided at the organ, and Mr. H. J. Baker conducted with skill and precision.

Miss Leonora Jackson gave a most successful concert at the Berlin Singakademie, with the co-operation of the Philharmonic Orchestra, on the 8th ult. In her interpretation of the Concertos in E major by Bach and D minor by Vieuxtemps, the Caprice by Paganini, and other numbers, the gifted young violinist fairly aroused the enthusiasm of her audience, and her performance has met with equal appreciation in the press. Herr Otto Lessmann, the well-known critic, in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, praises the faultless technique, the warm and sympathetic tone and artistic insight of the executant, whom he places in the front rank of lady violinists of the present day.

Royal Academy of Music.—The Erard Centenary Scholarships for harp and pianoforte have been awarded as follows: Harp scholarship awarded to Gwendoline Alice Eilian Mason (of Bangor, North Wales). The examiners were Messrs. John Cheshire, F. Corder, and John Thomas (Chairman). Pianoforte scholarship awarded to Edwin York Bowen (of Forest Hill). The examiners were Messrs. Frederick Dawson, Rudolf Zwintscher, and Sir A. C. Mackenzie (Chairman). The examiners highly commended Gladys Naylor Carne, and commended Agnes McKean, McIntyre, and Hubert C. V. Gascoigne.

The Westminster Orchestral Society has enlisted the services of Colonel Sir John Wolfe-Barry, K.C.B., F.R.S., as their chairman for the ensuing season. The President of the Institute of Civil Engineers is not only a man of immense activity and prominently identified with all kinds of philanthropic work in Westminster, but is also a talented musical amateur, his principal instrument being the viola. The Society has issued an excellent prospectus for the season, and bids fair to do as good work in the future as it has accomplished in the past.

Professor Xaver Scharwenka, the eminent pianist and composr, who in 1891 took up his residence in New York, where he has established a musical academy, is about to return to Berlin in order to resume an active share in the direction of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium in that capital. Professor Scharwenka, who will likewise take over the principal professorship for pianoforte playing at the Institution referred to, has just completed a new Pianoforte Concerto in C sharp minor, which is shortly to be published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig.

The committee of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein have opened a prize competition (for the first time in the history of the Institution) with an offer of a thousand marks for a symphony or a symphonic poem; of five hundred marks each for a concerto for one or more stringed instruments and a chamber work for strings or wind instruments, without pianoforte, and of three hundred marks for a vocal scena, with orchestra. The successful works are to be first produced at one of the meetings of the Society.

On Monday, the 17th ult., Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given in Trinity Church House, Great Portland Street, the chorus being formed by the combined choirs of Holy Trinity, Marylebone, and St. James's, Paddington, while the symphony and accompaniments were supplied by the orchestra of the Borough Polytechnic Institute. Miss Gertrude Izard and Mr. Gilbert Denis gave artistic renderings of the solo parts. Mr. Henry Long was at the pianoforte, and Mr. Henry J. B. Dart conducted.

The annual report of the Nonconformist Choir Union is a document calling for much congratulation. Founded in 1888, the Union has made steady progress and can point to a record of excellent work. The orchestral band of the Union holds its meetings for rehearsal on the first Saturday afternoon in every month, from November to June, at Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, from 3 to 5. Mr. T. R. Croger, 114, Wood Street, is the honorary secretary of the Union.

Miss Susetta Fenn's annual concert took place at Brixton Hall on the 15th ult. Among the artists who took part were Miss Alwine Bussey, Mrs. Charles Bartlett, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Robert Hilton. Miss Susetta Fenn evoked much applause by her rendering of "Le parlate d'amor" ("Faust"), as did Mr. Bertie Gow, who contributed several excellent recitations.

A special Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held at Islington Presbyterian Church on the 9th ult., when the music was excellently rendered by the choir under the direction of Mr. Harold E. Mackinlay, the organist and choirmaster of the church. The choir are now rehearsing Spohr's "The Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Athalie."

Antonin Dvorák is engaged upon the score of a new Czech opera, which is to be brought out at the National Theatre, Prague, early in the new year. The title, says Dalibor, is "Cert a Kaca" ("The Devil and the Shrew"), the libretto, by A. Wenig, being founded, as may be inferred, upon a popular Bohemian story.

As the result of a competition opened some time since by the Berlin weekly paper Deutsche Nachrichten for the composition of a song for the German navy, the first prize, out of 103 competitors, has recently been awarded to Mr. Otto Manns, a grand-nephew of Mr. August Manns, and principal viola in the Crystal Palace orchestra.

Drury Lane will be the first theatre to adopt some of the methods advocated by Mr. Edwin O. Sachs in his work on "Stage Construction," in the form of electric power for moving scenery. The work is now being carried out under the personal direction of Mr. Sachs.

The conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held at one time by Mr. Georg Henschel, and subsequently by Herr W. Gericke, lately Capellmeister at the Viennese Opera, has been again accepted by the latter. Herr Gericke left Vienna for the United States last month.

Mr. F. Cunningham Woods gave an interesting lecture at the new Lecture Hall in connection with the East Finchley Congregational Literary Society. The subject of the lecture was "Music, ancient and modern—especially modern."

The inaugural address of the session, 1898-99, of Trinity College (London) was delivered by the warden, Professor E. H. Turpin, on the 4th ult. Dr. Turpin's subject was entitled "For the sake of Art."

Mr. Percy Harmon has been appointed professor of sight-singing and conductor of the College Choir at the Metropolitan College of Music, North London.

Sir Frederick Bridge began his autumn series of Gresham College music lectures on the 24th ult., too late for detailed notice in this number.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Barcelona.—After having been closed for nearly twelve months, the Novedades Theatre re-opened its doors on September 25 with "Lakmé," Mdlle. Huguet and the tenor, Giannini, in the leading parts.——According to the annual report just published, over 1,300 pupils studied at the Municipal Conservatoire during the past academical year.

Bayreuth.—Frau Cosima Wagner has engaged the excellent tenor, Herr Hofmüller, for the part of David in next year's "Meistersinger" performances.——Among recent visitors at the villa "Wahnfried" have been Fräulein Ternina and MM. Van Rooy and Burgstaller. Madame Marcella Sembrich has also been staying here for a fortnight for the purpose of studying the part of Eva with Herr Julius Kniese, previous to her departure for the United States.

Berlin.—The first of the "Nibelungen" cycles, now being produced at the Royal Theatre, was completed on the 3rd ult., and gave general satisfaction. The house was crowded each night, Madame Ellen Gulbranson successfully appearing for the first time here in the part of Brünnhilde. "Brisëis," by M. Chabrier, and "Die Abreise," Mr. d'Albert's new one-act opera, were announced to be brought out last month. At the West-End Theatre, now under new and very active management, some interesting first performances have taken place. On September 22 Tschaïkowsky's "Eugène Oneguine" was given, and has proved so attractive that it has been frequently repeated during the past month. Another novelty was the production, on September 29, of the one-act opera "The Blacksmiths' Strike" ("Der Strike der Schmiede"), the libretto of which is founded on a drama by François Coppée, and very effectively treated, musically, by the Viennese composer, Max Joseph Beer. This piece was also very favourably received.——The concert season has commenced, not in a tentative sort of way, but with a perfect deluge of performances. Amongst the leading institutions, the Symphony Concerts of the Royal Orchestra gave their first performance on September 30, under Herr Weingartner's direction, with a Concerto for two violins, violoncello, and string orchestra by Handel, and the B flat major Symphony by Beethoven. The Philharmonic concerts, under Herr Nikisch's direction, followed on the 10th ult., with Madame Sembrich as the vocalist, and the "Scheherazade" Suite, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, amongst the pieces produced. A new symphony orchestra, formed under the baton of Herr C. Zimmer, gave its first performance on the 2nd ult., the programme including a "Meditation" for string orchestra, by Arthur Bird, which met with high appreciation. The Philharmonic Choir, under the conductorship of Herr Siegfried Ochs, will shortly introduce to Berlin audiences the four new sacred works by Verdi, as well as the Abbé Perosi's oratorio "The Resurrection of Lazarus."——The Government Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Prize has been conferred this year upon Leo Schrattenholz, a pupil of the Hochschule, for composition, and upon Fräulein Hodapp, of the Frankfurt Conservatorium, for pianoforte playing.——Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, the Australian pianist, gave a concert in the Singakademie on the 6th ult., at which he played the two Concertos in E flat by Beethoven and Liszt, and a Concerto of his own composition, which has been most favourably received by the public and criticised by the press.

Bologna.—The new oratorio "The Resurrection of Lazarus," by the young priest, the Abbé Perosi, was performed three times last month at the Teatro Communale to enormous audiences, and the work is being received with enthusiasm in many other Italian towns.

Buenos Ayres.—Senhor José Vianna da Motta, the Portuguese pianist, is just now engaged upon an extensive concert tour in South America, with the special purpose of introducing the compositions of the classical masters of his instrument to his audiences.

Carlsruhe.—There was a very numerous attendance of French and Belgian musicians to witness the performance, at the Court Theatre, of the Berlioz operas, "Beatrice et Benedict" (founded on Shakespeare's "Much Ado about Nothing") being given on September 27, and the production of "Les Troyens" (two parts) terminating on the 1st ult. The performance, under Herr Mottl's direction, was superb, and the regret was general that these works, and particularly the charming comic opera in question, should be so utterly neglected elsewhere.——One of Ferdinand Raimund's most poetical fairy dramas, "Die gefesselte Poesie," with music supplied by Herr Mottl from Schubert's operatic scores, was revived last month at the Court Theatre and continues to be a source of attraction.

Cassel.—A new four-act opera, entitled "Wulfrin," by Herr Reinhold Hermann, was produced for the first time at the Court Theatre, on the 11th ult., under Dr. Baier's direction, with considerable success.

Christiania.—Madame Bergliot Ibsen, the daughter-in-law of the celebrated dramatist and daughter of the poet Björnson, is just now engaged upon a tour as a concert singer in Germany and Austria-Hungary.

Copenhagen.—The one-act opera "Hero," by the Danish composer, Ludwig Schytte, was brought out with good success on September 30, at the Royal Theatre. The new work, which should perhaps rather be called an operatic scene, contains only one solo part.

Dresden.—A festival concert was given on September 22, at the Royal Theatre, in the presence of the King of Saxony and an enormous and most enthusiastic audience, to celebrate the 350th anniversary of the foundation of the Royal orchestra. The programme consisted entirely of works by former conductors of the venerable Institution, including Schütz, Hasse, Weber, Marschner, Reissiger, Rietz, and Wagner, among the soloists being Mesdames Malten, Wedekind, and Mary Krebs; Herren Schuch and Hagen conducting. The proceeds are to go towards the monument to be erected to Wagner, who himself conducted the ter-centenary of the orchestra in 1848.——Frau Schuch-Proska, the distinguished prima donna, well known also to London audiences, has just retired from the lyrical stage, after an association of twenty-five years with the Royal Opera, and while yet in the full possession of her rare artistic qualities.

Genoa.—The Maëstro L. Parodi has just completed the score of an important oratorio, "St. John the Baptist," which is to be produced in connection with the religious celebrations now being organised under the auspices of the Archbishop of Genoa. The work is divided into four parts and is said to be highly dramatic in its treatment and steeped in Oriental colouring.

Glarus (Switzerland).—The abuse of the "King of instruments" for the display of musical pyrotechnics, at one time of no unusual occurrence on the part of certain virtuosi, has happily become somewhat rare in these latter days. An instance in point was furnished, however, at an organ recital recently given by a Herr C. Meister, which included a descriptive piece, "Scènes et orage dans les Alpes." In this, after the inevitable Ranz des Vaches, the audience were treated to the twitter of the birds, the voice of the cuckoo, the echo and other natural phenomena, culminating in a most realistic thunderstorm; the whole concluding with a representation of the prayerful gratitude of an Alpine peasantry at the final subsidence of the cataclysm.

Hamburg.—A new three-act comic opera, "Der Prinz wider Willen," by Herr Otto Lohse, was brought out with much success, on the 2nd ult., at the Stadt-Theater, under the composer's direction.

Jena.—Dr. Carl Gille, for many years the highly esteemed principal secretary of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, was able to celebrate, on the 8th ult., his eighty-fifth birthday. Dr. Gille is amongst the few surviving persons who were personally acquainted with Goethe.

Leipzig.—The Liszt Verein announces an important programme for the season about to commence, which will comprise twelve concerts. In the course of these there will appear the Meiningen orchestra, conducted by Herr Fritz Steinbach; the Kaim orchestra, of Munich, under Herr Weingartner's direction. Amongst the various works to be produced, in addition to the Liszt numbers, are Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a new symphonic work by Herr Weingartner, while Herr von Possart, of Munich, will give his "Enoch Arden" recitation, with Herr Richard Strauss's incidental music, already successfully performed elsewhere.——Handel's oratorio "Esther" is to be performed by the Riedel Verein, on the 16th inst., with the co-operation of the orchestras of the Gewandhaus and of the Stadt-Theater.——Herr Hans Winderstein, the well-known orchestral conductor, has accepted the conductorship of the Leipzig Singakademie, in the room of Dr. Klengel, the new director of the New York Liedertafel.——At the first Gewandhaus concert, under Herr Nikisch's direction, on the 6th ult., Beethoven's "Eroica" and the funeral dirge "Siegfried's Tod," from "Götterdämmerung," were performed in memory of the late Prince Bismarck.

Madrid.—A new opera by the Spanish composer Serrano, entitled "Gonzola de Cordoba," is shortly to be brought out at the Royal Opera. Wagner's "Die Walküre" is in course of preparation and will be produced for the first time with a Spanish version of the book. Madame Calvé will appear during the season, and a new conductor has been engaged in the person of M. Crickboom, a Belgian artist, and director of the Philharmonic Society in Barcelona.

Milan.—Verdi, who has permanently taken up his residence here in order to superintend the final establishment of the Home for Musicians founded by him, is again credited with the composition and near completion of a new opera—"King Lear," according to some, but "Nero," according to other informants, Arrigo Boïto being the librettist. The score, report adds, is to be submitted ere long to a circle of the veteran composer's intimate friends.

Moscow.—M. Willem Kes will be the conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts throughout the present season. On taking over his duties, on the 1st ult., as the newly appointed director of the Musical Academy affiliated to the Philharmonic Society, M. Kes was received at the entrance by the members of the committee with the customary offer of salt and bread.

Munich.—Heinrich Vogl, the veteran Wagner tenor, has completed the score of an opera, "Der Fremdling," with a subject taken from Norse mythology, the book by Felix Dahn, which will be produced this winter at the Royal Theatre.——Among new works to be brought out in the immediate future are Langer's "Pfeifer von Haardt" and Eugene d'Albert's one-act opera "Die Abreise.——The Kaim concerts were announced to be resumed on the 26th ult., under Herr Felix Weingartner's direction, and subscribers are looking forward to a very active and interesting season. In addition to the regular series of concerts, the orchestra will perform twelve of Liszt's symphonic poems, in four extra concerts, to be conducted by Professor Kellermann.

Prague.—Quite a number of first performances are promised by the directors of the National Theatre during the present season. Amongst them are four new works by native composers, one of which, "On Easter Eve," by A. Horák, was successfully produced last month. Besides these, Tschaïkowsky's "Yolanthe," and "Goplana," by the Polish composer, Zelenski, are also to be brought out, as well as, for the first time in the Czech language, Mozart's "Così fan tutte."——A new opera, "Satanella," by the veteran Bohemian composer, Joseph Rozkosny, produced on the 5th ult., was very favourably received.

Remscheid.—A concert given last month by the baritone singer, Herr Carl Schneider, derived special interest by reason of the age of the concert-giver, which is ninety-four years, while his voice has lost but little of its original freshness and power. Although claims of priority as to age are apt to be upset, Herr Schneider may safely be looked upon as the doyen of public vocalists.

Stockholm.—The new Royal Opera House—a handsome building and excellent in its acoustic properties—was opened on September 29, in the presence of the King and the Royal family. The proceedings, which were of a specifically national character, commenced with the performance of a cantata written for the occasion by Ivar Hallström, followed by the drama "Frondeure," with music by Lindblad, and scenes from the opera "Estrella de Soria," by Berwald.

Turin.—The prize competition, for an orchestral composition, in connection with the International Exhibition, has brought forward sixty-two candidates. The first prize was awarded to Signor Nicolo Celega, for an orchestral suite entitled "Incantesimo," and the second to Signor Giacomo Orefice, for a similar work superscribed "Sinfonia del Bosco." Signori Toscanini, Martucci, and Sgambati were members of the jury.

Verviers.—The monument erected to Henri Vieuxtemps, the great violinist, who died in 1881, was unveiled in this his native town, on September 25, in the presence of the public authorities and a large concourse of spectators. During the ceremony a hymn-cantata by the deceased artist, and an "Ode à Vieuxtemps" by the talented young composer, M. Albert Dupuis, were performed by the combined musical societies of Verviers, and in the evening a grand concert took place at the theatre, when the chef-d'œuvre of Vieuxtemps, the Fourth Concerto, was played by his favourite pupil, M. Eugène Ysaye.

Vienna.—After having been closed for an entire week, on account of the mourning into which the country has been thrown, the Imperial Opera re-opened on September 21 with "Rheingold," in which M. van Dyck appeared in the part of Loge. Since then two entire performances of the "Nibelungen" tetralogy have taken place, ending on the 13th ult., under Herr Mahler's direction. Boieldieu's evergreen "La Dame Blanche" was revived with much success on the 9th ult., and Frau von Ehrenstein has been greatly applauded as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Herr Mahler intends shortly to produce the Abbé Perosi's "The Resurrection of Lazarus," with the personnel of the Imperial Opera. Signor Perosi, it may be added, was a pupil at the well-known Kirchenmusik-Schule, of Regensburg.——At the Theater-an-der-Wien, a new operetta, "Cat and Mouse," is in preparation, the composer of which is Johann Strauss, junior, a nephew of the veteran composer of the "Blue Danube" valse.——The resignation by Dr. Richter of the conductorship of the Philharmonic concerts has been confirmed. He will be succeeded by Herr Mahler, whose already multitudinous duties have been recently augmented by his assumption of the post of regisseur-general of the Opera.

Würzburg.—A commemorative tablet has just been placed, with due ceremonies, upon the house where the once famous musical theorist, organist, and composer, Abt Vogler, first saw the light. Students of Browning will be familiar with at least the name of this eccentric and somewhat problematical man of genius, among whose pupils were Carl Maria von Weber and Meyerbeer. Vogler was born in 1749.

Zwickau.—Subscriptions amounting to upwards of 35,000 marks have been received towards the monument to be erected to Robert Schumann. A prize competition is about to be opened by the committee for the most approved model of the projected memorial, which it is hoped may be unveiled on June 8, 1900, the ninety-ninth birthday of the composer.

OBITUARY.

Much sympathy will be felt by the friends of Mr. Josiah Booth in the loss he has sustained by the death of his wife, which sad event took place at his residence, Allesley, Coolhurst Road, Crouch End, on the 14th ult.

The death took place, on the 14th ult., at 60, Avonmore Road, West Kensington, of Henry William Goodban, an Associate of the Royal Academy of Music, in his eighty-second year. Mr. Goodban was a violoncello player and composer. His father, two brothers, and a nephew were all musicians.

The death is announced, on the 8th ult., at Vienna, of Nicolaus Oesterlein, the founder of the unique Wagner Museum, at the age of fifty-eight. An ardent lover of music, the deceased's enthusiasm was kindled by his perusal, some thirty years ago, of Wagner's "Opera and Drama," and he conceived the idea of collecting everything which had reference to the poet-composer and his art. An admirably compiled catalogue from the pen of the collector has been published, in four volumes, by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, and gives an idea of the wealth of material contained in the collection to be utilised by the future biographer of the Bayreuth master. Herr Oesterlein, who for many years occupied the post of cashier at a Viennese brewery, first attracted the attention of Wagner admirers by the publication, in 1876, of an interesting volume entitled "Bayreuth," dealing with the inauguration of the Festspiele.

The death occurred, on September 27, at Paris, of Louis Desormes, the former conductor of the Folies-Bergère, and a successful composer. Amongst his compositions are numerous pianoforte pieces, ballets, and chansons, the latter including the famous "En revenant de la Revue," which enjoyed such a world-wide popularity a decade or so ago. M. Desormes was in his fifty-ninth year.

Louis Gallet, the well-known librettist, died in Paris, on the 15th ult., aged sixty-three. He wrote the librettos for Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," Saint-Saëns's "Ascanio," Paladilhe's "Patrie," and numerous others. He was also the author of some successful dramas and was an entertaining contributor to Le Ménestrel and other Paris journals. M. Gallet occupied for many years a post in the administrative department of the French hospitals.

Professor von Königsloew, the well-known violinist, who, in the course of his career, had been in artistic relations and friendly intercourse with Schumann, Brahms, Joachim, Dr. Reinecke, and other distinguished musicians, died at Bonn, on the 8th ult., at an advanced age.

George R. Kempe, for many years an esteemed organist and teacher at Milwaukee (U.S.), died on September 27, aged fifty-two.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ROBERT BROWNING AS A MUSICIAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the interesting biographical notice of Mr. Dannreuther in your October issue (p. 650), that gentleman, in recording some recollections of Mr. Chorley and his friends, says, speaking of Browning and his liking for music: "I have never seen him touch an instrument or hum a tune."

It has been my good fortune to hear him do both, and the details of the circumstance may interest lovers of Browning. In 1885 I was asked by the Browning Society to produce the tragedy "A Blot on the 'Scutcheon," and it was my privilege to have several interviews with the great poet with regard to the performance. He was throughout most kind and genial, and, unlike most dramatic authors, left the arrangement of the play entirely in my hands, allowing me to make whatever cuts I deemed advisable. At my earnest solicitation he was present at the performance in a curtained box—a fact not known to the audience, nor, indeed, to his admirers generally. Browning hated a fuss, and it was only on my pledging my word that his presence should not be made known except to the performers that he consented to attend.

Shortly afterwards I again called on him at his residence in Warwick Crescent, when, after expressing himself much pleased with the performance, he made a very flattering reference to the beautiful setting of the song "There's a woman like a dewdrop," which Sir Alexander Mackenzie had written at my request. Mr. Browning said: "It is a most charming setting as a song, but my own idea was rather that in the play the song should be more suggested than sung—hummed, in fact—as the young lover enters Mildred's window and bends over her." Whereupon he sat down to the pianoforte and hummed a verse of the song to an extemporised tune, playing his own accompaniment. My regret is that I was not able to jot this down and thus have secured a permanent record of a song written and composed by Robert Browning.—Yours faithfully,

Charles Fry.

CHORAL COMMUNION SERVICES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—With the widening use of the Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei during Choral Communion Services in the English Church, may I be allowed to direct the future attention of composers to a point that, in many compositions, appears to have been entirely overlooked or ignored? I refer to the length of these portions of the service, which, as a general rule, take a good deal longer in performance than the private prayers of the celebrant. I am aware that a hard and fast time limit cannot be laid down (inasmuch as different priests have different uses), but certainly it cannot be contested that, from the celebrant's point of view, many such compositions are of unnecessary length.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, Magister Choralis.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Armagh.—The Philharmonic Society held its annual general meeting on the 6th ult. Four concerts are announced for the coming season: Gaul's "Joan of Arc," for the first concert, on the 24th inst.; "The Messiah," December 15; a popular concert, January 26, 1899; and the final concert of the season on February 23. Dr. T. Osborne Marks is the conductor and Dr. Bearder and Mr. T. R. Tarleton are the honorary secretaries.

Berkeley (Gloucestershire).—The Berkeley Choral Society, which has only been in existence for twelve months, gave two concerts on Tuesday, the 18th ult., in the Great Hall of Berkeley Castle, by kind permission of the president, the Rt. Hon. Lord Fitzhardinge. The first part of each programme consisted of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," the solo parts of which were sung by Miss Marion Harris, Mrs. W. Legge, Mr. T. H. Brearley, and Mr. H. P. Thurston. The choruses were admirably sung, giving evidence of most careful training and reflecting great credit on the conductor, Mr. Walter Woodcock, organist of the Parish Church, and the members of the Society themselves. The second part of each concert included violin solos by Mons. Johannes Wolff, pianoforte solos by Mr. Herbert Fryer, and vocal solos and glees. Mr. F. A. Sewell was the accompanist.

Chorley (Lancashire).—A festival choral service was held at St. George's Church, on September 21, in which the combined choirs of St. George's, St. Peter's, and Whittle-le-Woods took part. The anthem was "Blessed be the God and Father" (Wesley) and Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Tours, in F). Mr. J. Stubbs, organist and choirmaster, presided at the organ with praiseworthy skill.

Hanley.—The first Meakin concert of the season was given on the 3rd ult., in the Victoria Hall, by the Hallé Band, conducted by Mr. F. H. Cowen. There was a large audience and the programme included the "Unfinished" Symphony (Schubert), Overture from "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner), and Air and Variations from Suite in G (Tschaïkowsky). Miss Florence Hoskins contributed to the success of the concert by her rendering of "Lascia ch' io pianga" (Handel) and "Le parlate d'amor" ("Faust").

Henley-on-Thames.—The Harvest Festival was held at Holy Trinity Church, on the 13th ult. (and continued on the following Sunday), when Prout's 100th Psalm was sung by the choirs of Wargrave and Holy Trinity, conducted by the organist and choirmaster of the latter church (Mr. J. H. Chalmers). Master G. Glasspoole sang the solo parts excellently, and Mr. A. E. Healey, organist of Wargrave, accompanied on the organ. A quartet of brass instruments proved a useful addition to the organ accompaniment.

Lowestoft.—Mr. J. T. Pye gave an excellent concert in the Public Hall, on the 18th ult., when Mrs. Linwood Watson and Mr. G. B. Rix were the vocalists, with Mr. Basil F. Taylor (violin), Mr. Bertie Withers (violoncello), and Mr. Pye (pianoforte) as instrumentalists. A small local choir was responsible for several part-songs.

Newport (Shropshire).—The harvest festival services and anniversary of the restoration of the Parish Church were held on the 13th and 16th ult., when Thomas Adams's cantata "The Rainbow of Peace" was twice efficiently given by the Parish Church choir, under the direction of Mr. Smart, organist. It proved to be an effective, well-written, but by no means difficult work, and most suitable for harvest-tide.

Port Elizabeth (South Africa).—The third of a series of high class concerts was given on September 22, at the Liedertafel, by Mr. Horace Barton and Herr August Wilhelmj. The programme included Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor and Gade's in F. Miss Ethel Biden was the violinist and Mr. Percival Jackson the violoncellist. Mr. Barton played solos by Chopin, Tschaïkowsky, and Chaminade, and Herr Wilhelmj sang songs by Schubert, Schumann, Jensen, and others.

San Fernando (Trinidad).—The Choral Society gave its first concert on September 10, when a successful performance of Gaul's "Holy City" was given. This concert marks a distinct step forward in the musical achievements of this little town of 6,000 inhabitants. Mr. Gaul's cantata was performed by a trained choir and a small but efficient orchestra. The solos were sung by Mrs. Doorly, Mrs. T. G. Grant, Mrs. E. Legge, Dr. Eakin, Messrs. Poyer, Crosbie, Shurland, and Rev. A. H. Grey. Herr C. Nothnagel and several other friends from the Port of Spain gave valuable help in the orchestra. The concert was under the direction of the Society's conductor, Rev. Canon W. S. Doorly.

Wellington (New Zealand).—Mr. Maughan Barnett gave his fifteenth organ recital in St. John's Church on August 25. The programme included Mendelssohn's Sixth Sonata, Handel's Concerto in F (No. 5), and works by Wagner, Grison, Dubois, Wolstenholme, Dienel, Calkin, and Wély.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Charles R. Kemshead, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Harringay.—Mr. Alfred Brinkler, Organist and Choirmaster to Minster Church, Thanet.—Mr. Herbert G. Loveday, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's, Sligo, Ireland.—Miss Firth, to Ennis Parish Church, Co. Clare.—Mr. Arthur J. H. Townsend, to Christ Church, Bridlington Quay.—Mr. Arthur Mangelsdorff, Organist and Choirmaster to Atherstone Parish Church.—Mr. Robert Treen, Organist and Choirmaster to All Saints' Church, East Finsbury.—Mr. R. H. Turner, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Portsmouth.—Mr. Ernest H. G. Hayward, Organist and Choirmaster to Backwell Parish Church, Somerset.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. Henry S. Lucas, Alto to All Saints', Margaret Street.—Master Hubert Kingston, Treble to the Chapel Royal, Savoy.—Mr. Clifford Constable, Tenor to All Saints', Margaret Street.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. G. C.—In reply to your enquiry respecting the Solesmes method of singing Gregorian tones, we gladly offer the following information. The great authority on the subject is Dom Joseph Pothier. See his "Les Mélodies Grégoriennes d'après la tradition," published in 1880, at Tournay. You might also consult "Der Einfluss des Tonischen Accentes auf die melodische und rhythmische Struktur der Gregorianischen Psalmodie von den Benediktinern zu Solesmes," &c. (Herder'sche Verlagshandlung, Freiburg im Breisgau). In England the Rev. Gregory Ould, Arno's Court, Bristol, is an authority on the subject. But in order to obtain thorough knowledge of the traditional Solesmes method, practice is of more value than precept—the ear and not the eye. To this end, as you live in London, you should take an opportunity of going to Farnborough and hearing Vespers sung after the Solesmes traditions by the Benedictines there. We believe that they are only sung on alternate days, but an enquiry made beforehand would bring you definite information as to the actual days. You should take a Benedictine Antiphona with you to follow the service. The Plain-song and Mediæval Music Society might help you. Mr. H. B. Briggs, 14, Westbourne Terrace Road, is the honorary secretary. See also a paper read before the Musical Association on February 8 last, entitled "The Structure of Plain-song," by Mr. H. B. Briggs.

C. W. N.—In reply to your question as to the newest Edison phonograph, we can say from practical knowledge that it is a very wonderful instrument. The tone qualities of various musical instruments are reproduced with remarkable fidelity, though the various gradations of tone are, perhaps, not so marked a feature, though they are by no means absent. You ask, "Does it reproduce music (orchestral music principally) in a manner that would satisfy a musical ear?" That question is perhaps a little difficult to answer. There is naturally a ventriloquistic character about the reproductions, but by no means sufficient to be offensive to the ear. There will probably be improvements in the construction of the instrument, whereby the most delicate effects will be absolutely reproducible, though it is almost too much to expect that the results obtainable will be equal to the original sounds. But, as we have already said, it is a most wonderful invention, and one whose use will give much pleasure and not a little amusement. The cost is six guineas; but a large metal bell, which amplifies the sound and effectively disperses it in a large room, would cost about fifty shillings more.

Agricola.—(a) The C sharps in the bass should be played with the lowest note of the right-hand arpeggio. In your other example (in E minor) the treble E must be played with the first note of the left-hand (arpeggio) chord. (b) For information upon the subject of Equal Temperament consult Dr. Stone's primer, "The Scientific Basis of Music" (Novello); John Curwen's "A Tract on Musical Statics"; T. F. Harris's "Handbook of Acoustics" (J. Curwen and Sons); and Bosanquet's "An Elementary Treatise on Musical Intervals and Temperament"; also the article "Temperament" in Stainer and Barrett's "Dictionary of Musical Terms" (Novello) and in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." The most exhaustive treatise on the subject is Helmholtz's "Sensations of Tone," translated by A. J. Ellis. (c) "I.S.M." is an abbreviation for "The Incorporated Society of Musicians."

J. C.—(1) Miss Amy Fay's book "Music Study in Germany" is published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. Price 4s. 6d. (2) Gottschalk's "Notes of a Pianist" is published by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott and Company (London). (3) Back volumes (bound) of The Musical Times may be obtained of the publishers. Those within the last fifteen years for certain, price 7s. 6d. each. The earlier volumes are very scarce; but if you will send us word as to any particular volume we shall be glad to give you every information.

H. M. C.—In the bass recitative "In the beginning," forming No. 2 of Haydn's "Creation," the note sung to the word "void" should be G natural, not G flat. Not only is it G natural in the first edition, issued in 1800, the proofs of which evidently passed under Haydn's eye, but it is also thus in the German editions, as well as in the current editions issued by Messrs. Novello. It appears that G flat was once a tradition, but there seems to be no authenticity for the lowered form of the note.

C. H. T.—(1) An English translation of Wieck's "Piano and Singing" was published by Messrs. Lockwood, Brooks and Co., Boston, Mass., in 1875; but we do not know if it is still in print, or of another edition (in English) of the work. (2) For books on pianoforte technique, consult "Technique and Expression in Pianoforte Playing" (Novello) and "Primer of Pianoforte Playing" (Macmillan), both by Mr. Franklin Taylor.

H. L.—The notation of that particular passage (III.) in Schumann's "Blumenstück" has often proved a "stumbling-block." This and kindred difficulties in interpreting pianoforte music will shortly be dealt with in a practical manner by Mr. Edward Dannreuther in the form of an article he has promised to contribute to The Musical Times.

A. S. N.—Why not ask an organ builder in your neighbourhood to give you an estimate for the cleaning of the instrument? It is impossible for us to give you an idea of the cost, especially as you mention "some repairs"; but your suggestion of £15 is, we think, too small an amount for the work necessary to be done.

Pianist.—As we have already stated, we cannot undertake to recommend teachers of music. The professor you mention has a great reputation, and you may safely put yourself under his guidance.

A. B. M.—We cannot give the names of teachers and coaches. The professor you mention has a high reputation. You may address him at the Royal College of Music, Kensington.

Organ (Glasgow).—You may very well run the risk of having to pay a performing fee if you specially wish to play the piece, as the amount is purely nominal.

R. A. G.—Jensen's "Nonnengesang" for female voices, with accompaniment of two horns and a harp, has been performed in England at least a dozen times.

C. B.—Apply to Mr. N. Vert, 6, Cork Street, W., for the information you require.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. * One exception to this occurs in No. 2 (No. 23, by Lord Mornington), which is included on account of its great popularity.

CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF THE MUSIC
BY
SIR JOHN STAINER
M.A., MUS. DOC., OXFORD; HON. D.C.L. AND MUS. DOC., DURHAM
PROFESSOR OF MUSIC IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

The manuscript from which these compositions are transcribed is probably one of the most valuable store-houses of early 15th century music in existence. The Editors have selected secular compositions as being less conventional than the Masses of that period, and also more rarely met with. So little music of this early date has been printed that students of musical history have hitherto had little but hearsay to rely on. They will now be able to see works by Dufay, Binchois, Brasart, Frenon, Acourt, and many others, some of whom have up to this time been only known by name. Eight facsimiles are given, to show the style and method of writing music at this time; a subject fully treated in this work.

THE TIMES.

The work is written not only with a strong feeling for legitimate effect, but with a remarkable degree of strength and straightforward expression. Dignified and manly, yet with no lack of tenderness, the work proceeds upon an even course. Its construction, whether in the simpler strains of the opening or in the well-written fugal passages farther on, is in the highest degree skilful, and, in particular, the handling of a prominent theme with which the choral portion opens is of unsurpassable felicity.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

For my part, I found the music sound and straightforward, and I greeted it as one greets an old friend.

MORNING POST.

This is an unpretentious but scholarly work, grateful to the singers and pleasing to the listeners.

DAILY NEWS.

Suited to the small choirs, among whom it will very possibly become popular.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It possesses most of the attributes finding acceptance with amateur choralists. Under such circumstances it would not be surprising were it taken in hand in many quarters.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

A manly, vigorous piece of writing, in thorough harmony with the best traditions of the English school.

DAILY MAIL.

A solidly-written composition, worthy the best traditions of the English Church.

THE GUARDIAN.

It is finely conceived and treated with no ordinary skill in a sound, musicianly manner, remarkable originality, and genuine expression.

YORKSHIRE POST.

In one thing he has been particularly happy, his choice of a chief subject, "a motto theme," as it might be called, that pervades the whole work, and has both grace and distinction. The solo part, too, has many passages of real feeling. . . . One chorus, "With loins upgirt,' is based on a Polonaise rhythm, which may seem strange in a sacred work, but is not inappropriate in effect, being remarkably vigorous and spirited.

*UNA

SIXTH AND SEVENTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Ninth and Tenth Thousand.
This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twentieth to Twenty-fifth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

*ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

"Two new songs by Arthur Somervell are among the most beautiful compositions that have lately appeared; the one to Shakespeare's 'Take, O take those lips away,' may claim a place with those few specimens of the wedding of 'perfect music unto noble words' which are rightly called classical, and the other, 'Love's Apology,' is associated with a fine anonymous poem which first appeared in the Book of Ayres by Tobias Hume in 1605. Both songs have a comparatively small compass, of an octave and one note, and should be well within the powers of even moderately accomplished singers who can interpret beautiful music of the highest class."—The Times.

THE BISPHAM ALBUM.

TEN SONGS BY SCHUBERT AND SCHUMANN.

Edited by David Bispham.

Price 3s. net.

"Not the least significant sign of the healthy progress of musical taste in England is the artistic advance shown in much of the music put forward for home use. It is true that some publishers continue to issue compilations which can only be described as good paper spoilt; and, therefore, presumably there is still a buying public for feeble verses and trite melodic and harmonic progressions. Those firms, however, who strive to minister to artistic progress deserve every encouragement; and accordingly it is with much pleasure that we draw attention to Twelve Pianoforte Pieces by Granville Bantock, issued by Messrs. Forsyth, for they belong to a class that is calculated to develop appreciation of real music. They are severally named Rhapsodie, Meditation, Phantasy, Scherzo, Nocturne, Legend, Prohiera, Mazurka, Intermezzo, Serenade, Caprice, and Romance, titles which are justified in each case by the character of the music. They are short and of moderate difficulty, and are more or less effective. The last-named quality, in great measure, arises from Mr. Bantock's recognition of the necessity of contrast. The advantage of this is very noticeable in the Meditation, which is prevented from degenerating, as frequently the case in such pieces, into mere maudlin sentimentality by an intermediate episode which might be construed as a lively recollection. 'Bright-eyed Fancy' trips with dainty grace in the Scherzo, and there is much poetic charm in the Nocturne. The Legend would form an excellent study for staccato wrist-playing; the Mazurka possesses an alluring grace which savours of the East, and it will not improbably prove to be the most popular of the series, although in this particular it will have a rival in the Caprice, which is an alert and fascinating little piece. In the Romance we have a true 'song without words'—one capable of being made very expressive by pianists who can make their instruments 'sing.' Tarantella d'Amore would seem to be a somewhat paradoxical title, but exception can be taken no farther than the name of Mr. Louis H. Hillier's brilliant pianoforte piece. This is dedicated to Miss Ella Pancera, and it may be recommended to the attention of players who possess nimble fingers. Similar in nature, but much easier to execute, is a Saltarello by Charles Davieson, in which the composer has cleverly suggested the leap from which the dance derives its name. Deux Valses, respectively in A and F sharp minor, by M. Esposito, are pleasing pieces, as are also a Polka Eccentrique and a Gavotte Pompadour by Erik Meyer Helmund, and an Allegretto Grazioso by Norman O'Neill. The same firm have recently published several songs which deserve notice. Mr. Arthur Somervell is never more happy than when his creative talent is aroused by words that call for a setting in the English school of the Elizabethan age; and the music he has allied to Shakespeare's lines, Take, O take those lips away, admirably reflects the spirit of the text, and is, moreover, grateful to sing. The anonymous words of Love's Apology, also by Mr. Somervell, suggest the same period, and the song may be recommended to baritone vocalists to whom the direct diction of our forefathers appeals. Two songs by Ethel Barns, a clever young violinist, merit praise and the favour of cultured singers. They are respectively entitled The Humble Swain and O Tsuri San. The former is a setting for a baritone voice of some impassioned words by J. Sylvester (1562-1618), and the latter a lament over the untimely death of a Japanese dancer, whose whilom fascinations are recounted to music possessing a dainty quaintness, quite in keeping with the subject of the lyric. The compass of the latter song is within the octave D to D. Nature's Lullaby, by Percy Pitt, is an unpretentious but well-written and melodious song, laid out for a soprano voice; while Spring calls to the Flowers, words by G. Whyte and music by G. Villa, is a bright little ditty, with an effective accompaniment, lying well under the hands. The last-named is also arranged as a duet. The Bispham Album is a collection of ten songs by Schubert and Schumann which have been selected and edited by Mr. David Bispham, and, it may be added, have been sung by him at his recitals. Only two by Schubert are contained in the album, but these are An die Musik ('To Music') and Der Zwerg ('The Dwarf'). These testify to Mr. Bispham's musicianship and conscientiousness as an editor. Breath marks are given whenever a doubt could arise on this important matter, and in the latter song there is pointed out in several places the necessity of change of vocal tone-colour. The same care has been bestowed on Schumann's lyrics, and a welcome feature is found in the excellent English translations which accompany the German text. It should be added that the songs have all been transposed to make them suitable for a baritone voice, but in each case the original key is notified. Music is now recognised as forming an important factor in the pastime and education of children, and the publication of cantatas and part-songs fitted to their abilities, and calculated to engender a love of the art, is to be encouraged. Admirably designed for such worthy purposes is a cantata for treble voices, entitled An April Shower, by Bernard and Arthur Page. The story may be described as 'all about nothing,' but in such cantatas it is the episodes that count, and these in the present instance bring forth songs, duets, and choruses of a bright and amusing character, which are wedded to melodious and appropriately simple strains. Löhr's School Songs, for equal voices in unison, and in two or three parts, present a series which is well conceived and skilfully carried out by composers manifestly in sympathy with the object in view."—Daily Telegraph, August 4, 1893.

ODE TO THE PASSIONS

BY

WILLIAM COLLINS

SET TO MUSIC FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Vocal Score, Price Two Shillings.
String Parts (in the Press); Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

Passages of delicate grace are admirably contrasted with more vigorous scenes, and the massive harmonies of the closing invocation to music, with their skilful building-up of a really impressive climax, reach a level that the composer has most seldom attained before.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Cowen's new Ode was accepted on all hands as a more than worthy offering on the part of a musician who stands unsurpassed among his fellows in the handling of delicate and fanciful themes.

MORNING POST.

The composer has approached his task in an earnest spirit, and has been singularly felicitous in his endeavours. The various passions which rule mankind find sympathetic expression in the music, and several portions possess great beauty. . . . The work possesses both charm and musical interest, and it is worthy to rank with the best of its composer's choral productions.

DAILY MAIL.

Mr. Cowen's latest cantata is one of his best inspirations. From first to last the music is interesting, the melodies are bright and taking, and the composer shows his mastery of modern instrumental resource.

DAILY NEWS.

In many respects it shows the composer at his best, and as the Ode is not too long nor too full of difficulties, and moreover as it is notable for that melodic inspiration of which Mr. Cowen has the rarely bestowed gift, there is not much doubt that it will speedily become popular with choral societies.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The score is graphic and picturesque, but not involved. . . . Of late years Mr. Cowen has given an expectant world nothing more characterised by his accustomed daintiness and grace, or, it may be added, more instinct with the force and impulse that, if displayed with equal skill on a larger canvas, might result in a majestic work, calculated to hold its own during a later generation.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Mr. Cowen's Ode is a genuine success; indeed, I should be inclined to rank it above anything he has yet written for the concert-room. . . . Mr. Cowen's Ode was received with great enthusiasm, and must be counted one of the great successes of the festival.

GLOBE.

Mr. Cowen's work deserves nothing but unlimited praise. . . . Short as the Ode is, it is a little masterpiece, and should prove one of the most lasting successes of the week.

THE GUARDIAN.

Mr. Cowen has seldom been more happily inspired. The charming sylvan scene and the broad and flowing strains of the Invocation to Music are passages of very remarkable merit well deserving the success attained.

YORKSHIRE POST.

The strongest choral work Mr. Cowen has yet produced. . . . His music shows an advance, not only in sustained power, but also in the choral-writing.

CARACTACUS

A CANTATA

For Soprano, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra

THE WORDS WRITTEN FOR MUSIC BY

H. A. ACWORTH, C.I.E.

THE MUSIC BY

EDWARD ELGAR.

Vocal Score, Price Three Shillings and Sixpence.
Paper boards, 4s.; cloth, gilt, 5s.; String Parts (in the Press); Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.; Vocal Parts, each 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Elgar's music has the inestimable merit that it seldom, if ever, conveys even a momentary suggestion of any other composer's work. All that he has to say is his own. . . . In some respects the representative themes, of which there are quite a formidable number, are treated with great skill and originality, and as each scene is worked up to its logical climax, so the series grows in interest up to the most beautiful point in the composition, a "lament" in which the voice of the defeated king is supported by the choir in a movement of such poignant expression and such sincerely-felt emotion that the fact of its being in the strange rhythm of seven crotchets in a bar is quite forgotten.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In "Caractacus" we find music that interests no less deeply than it charms, and for the most part these two qualities run side by side. . . . For the present I can do no less than offer sincere compliments to an English composer who speaks with so strong and commanding a voice.

THE STANDARD.

In "Caractacus" we have a work of which it may be said without the slightest hesitation that it is one of the greatest honours to English musical art that has been produced for many years. The wealth of melody in the score from the first bar to the last never fails, and it is ever fresh and unlaboured.

DAILY MAIL.

The cantata was received with enthusiasm and at the close the composer was recalled. The work is at once modern and original. There is a wealth of melody, and the barbaric grandeur of the triumphal procession through the streets of Rome is worthy of a Berlioz or a Wagner.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Elgar obviously knows how to interest the general public without sacrificing a whit of his musicianship. He is a melodist and a master of picturesque orchestral writing, while his choral workmanship, without being pedantic, is usually highly effective.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Elgar's musical personality is one to reckon with as a fact in art. He is academic in the excellent sense that he allows a real character, a genuine temperament, to be guided by the influence of the best masters; and he is wise to keep himself free from personal eccentricities, while at the same time fully giving the rein to his personal accomplishments. The result is that we get something so new in English music that one naturally hails it with respect and avowed expectation.

YORKSHIRE POST.

In the refreshing vigour of the music, the extraordinary grip of the orchestra, the mastery over all its resources, the keen appreciation of its colour, Mr. Elgar is quite supreme among our composers, and the freedom and force of his writing for the band are indeed remarkable. He is, however, not only capable of energetic effects, he can also give expression to extreme tenderness.

"The Virgil Piano School has just completed a course of four months, in which a number of children have been taught strictly according to the principles of the Virgil School, under the control of a committee of experts. The Virgil Method aims at a complete separation of the technical training from the tuition of the purely musical element, the technical exercises being performed on an extraordinarily ingeniously constructed toneless Clavier. Should this principle at the first moment appear doubtful, all objections are victoriously crushed by the brilliant results which the Virgil Piano School showed in the examination. It was particularly astounding to witness how children, who had not touched a key before, and had only practised on the toneless keyboard for four months, now produced at once an unusually even touch on the sounding pianoforte keyboard."—Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger, June 17, 1898.

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM.

("FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.")

"Likely to be one of the most valuable weapons which has been added to the armoury of the modern teacher during this century."
SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE.

RECENT TESTIMONY.

"I play old pieces infinitely better (without practice) than I used to when working at them."—G. P., London.

"I have done no finger studies of any sort since your instructions came, yet I can play ever so much better."—E., Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O.

"Difficulties which were once almost insurmountable now seem to fall to pieces as I play. The keyboard, which once seemed hard and unyielding, has now become like velvet to my fingers."—D. PARKES, Plymouth.

"Was afraid to play a piece in public. Now I have no fear at all. I play no technical exercises."—H., Mus. Bac.

"To me it has been a veritable godsend."—C. S. PARSONSON, Mus. Bac.

"You were quite right in assuming that I was in the habit of playing with a limp arm. I have derived wonderful benefit from your hint on this point."—K., Belfast.

"I had decided to send this piece (Czerny's Toccata) with test passages marked, but on playing it to-day I find the difficulties have almost vanished."—C., L.R.A.M.

"My technique has improved wonderfully—nay, almost incredibly. . . . I never feel the need of them (technical exercises) now; during the last few months I have done nothing of the sort."—C. T. R. SCOTT, Brussels.

"For lightness of touch I would not take off my hat to anybody. A lady said to me the other day that I must have practised a great deal to procure such a touch, and when I told her I did not practise at all at the keyboard, she looked dumbfounded."—W., F.R.C.O.

"I have found the system of the greatest possible use in teaching the piano, more particularly in the case of adult pupils, to many of whom music is now a delight instead of a toil as formerly. To teachers whose time is so fully occupied that they have no time for practice, Macdonald Smith's system is worth ten times the modest fee which he charges for lessons."—CHAS. G. BRYAN, Southport.

PREFACE.

The only way in which the Editor of a book of reference can show his gratitude to the public for demanding new editions on the exhaustion of the old, is by doing his best to keep its contents up to date. The reviser has done so; many articles have been entirely re-written or enlarged—e.g., Copyright and Licensing, Madrigal, Mass, Opera, Pianoforte, Pitch, and many of those little slips which show such persistent survival in works of this kind have been removed. The Editor is grateful to many, whose names are among the authors and helpers, for their share in this last revision.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

DECEMBER 1, 1898.

CHARLES VILLIERS STANFORD.

The Stanfords are an old Co. Cavan family. Charles Villiers Stanford, the most distinguished scion of the house, was born at No. 2, Herbert Street, Dublin, on September 30, 1852. He can trace his descent from David Verner, the ancestor of Sir William Verner, who fought at Waterloo, and of Lords Chief Justices Doherty and Bushe (from the latter of whom Mr. Plunket Greene is also descended); and, on his mother's side, from the Spring-Rices (Lord Monteagle) and William Henn, his maternal grandfather, who was a Master in Chancery. His father's brother was the Rev. Dr. Charles Stuart Stanford, rector of St. Thomas's, Dublin, who married Pamela Campbell, daughter of Sir Guy and Lady Campbell, a granddaughter of the famous Pamela, Lady Edward Fitzgerald.

Professor Stanford's male ancestors, both on his father and mother's side, were learned in the law, in which profession they rose to great eminence. His father, John Stanford, was Examiner in the Court of Chancery (Dublin) and Clerk of the Crown, Co. Meath. Mr. John Stanford was a highly cultivated musical amateur, and a very genial, kind-hearted man to boot. His house in Dublin was the rendezvous of the many distinguished musicians who visited the Irish capital. He played the violoncello; but his chief claim to musical distinction was the possession of a magnificent bass voice of unusual compass—"one of the best bass voices I ever heard," recalls his distinguished son with pardonable pride. On one occasion Lablache coached him in "Don Giovanni," when the great basso complimented the Dublin amateur with the remark: "Your Leporello is my second self!" Mr. Stanford sang the music of the Prophet in Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Dublin, December 9, 1847, upon the first performance of the oratorio in the Emerald Isle. "Mr. Stanford," records Saunders' News Letter, "was the Staudigl of the evening, and his fine voice and clear enunciation told admirably in the part of Elijah." But Mr. Stanford had received an invaluable lesson. In company with Mr. Joseph ("old Joe") Robinson he was present at the first performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio at Birmingham in August, 1846. Moreover, during the Festival week, he and Robinson entertained Mendelssohn and Sterndale Bennett at supper at the Woolpack Hotel, on which occasion they spent a very jolly evening. Villiers Stanford's mother was an excellent amateur pianist, and on one occasion she played Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto at a concert of the Dublin Musical Union. His parents very wisely made his general education a matter of supreme importance. He was sent to H. Tilney Bassett's school in Dublin, where, amongst his schoolfellows, were Conyngham Greene, C.B., Dunbar Barton, Q.C., Alfred Godley, a Fellow of Magdalen, and Woulfe Flanagan, who was so prominent in the Parnell letter business.

EARLY COMPOSITIONS.

Charlie Stanford began to compose at a very early age. It is interesting to peruse his first book of boyish compositions, written down in his mother's hand. The earliest specimen of the young composer's talent in this book is a double chant, dated "September, 1858," the only original portion of which is the fourth section!

Can it be credited that Professor Stanford's first appearance in public as a composer was in a pantomime? "Shure," as his countrymen would say, "and it's a fact." It is said that the pantomime, in which he first publicly demonstrated his muse, was "Puss-in-Boots." In September, 1860 (ætat eight), he had composed a March—designated Opus 1 in the MS. book!—and this March, being pressed into the service of the pantomime, was duly performed at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. No apology is needed for printing it in full:—

Digitized by Google

MARCH.

C. V. Stanford,
September, 1860.

The remaining compositions in this book consist of hymn-tunes, songs, a Lied for the pianoforte (of twelve bars only), an unfinished anthem, "My heart is fixed," and—dated "March 25, 1866"—an unaccompanied part-song to Longfellow's familiar words "O gladsome Light." Two "rotten" operas, to use their composer's designation, were also products of his boyhood.

EARLY TEACHERS.

The year 1860 was a memorable one for the juvenile composer, as, at his father's house, he first saw his friend Professor Joachim; but he was then so terribly frightened at being asked to play before the great violinist that he cried! A valuable pianoforte lesson from Thalberg is also a recollection of his childhood. And this naturally leads to an enumeration of the teachers who had a hand in his musical training during those early years. He learnt the violin from Mr. R. M. Levey, now in his eighty-eighth year, the father of the late W. C. Levey, of "Esmeralda" fame, and of the violinist known as "Paganini Redivivus." Mr. R. M. Levey, recalling Charlie Stanford's boyhood, writes: "He studied the violin with me, at which he made rapid progress, and mastered the technicalities of the instrument, as the violin parts of his works show." He was a pianoforte pupil of Miss Meeke (who had studied under Moscheles), Mrs. Joseph Robinson, Miss Flynn (a pupil of Moscheles and Mendelssohn), Sir Robert Stewart, and Michael Quarry. He also took lessons from Sir Robert Stewart in composition and organ, and he sometimes deputised as organist at St. Stephen's Church, where his anthems were frequently sung.

A PRODIGY PIANIST.

Master Stanford gave a private pianoforte recital at his father's house when he was only nine years old. The date was May 13, 1862, and the programme was as follows:—

PART FIRST.

Andante Cantabile (No. 2, Op. 51) ..... Beethoven
The Harmonious Blacksmith ..... Handel
Lieder ohne Worte—No. 4, 3rd Book;
No. 6, 5th Book..... Mendelssohn

PART SECOND.

Study—No. 4, Book I. (Op. 70) ..... Moscheles
Air, with variations, in A..... Mozart
Fuga Scherzando, in A minor ..... Bach

Two years later, when he was eleven years old, he gave another recital that attracted considerable attention. An account of it appeared in the now defunct Orchestra, and this was probably the first appearance of Professor Stanford's name in an English newspaper, now thirty-six years ago. Here is the notice, duly *Orchestra*ted:—

A most interesting and delightful "Pianoforte Recital" took place at the house of John Stanford, Esq., Herbert Street, on Tuesday last. Mr. Stanford is well known as a most accomplished amateur in music both vocal and instrumental, a liberal patron of all that is good in art, and a kind and genial friend of artists. The pianist on this occasion was Master Charles V. Stanford, his son, a youth aged about 10 years, of rare talent, who is doubtless destined for a great position in the musical world should it be his choice to follow the "divine art" as a profession. Here is the program:—

PART I.

Sonata in c minor (Op. 10)	Beethoven
Trois Etudes	Heller
Song, "A Venetian Dirge"	C. V. Stanford
La Contemplazione	Hummel
Prelude and Fugue in c minor	Bach

PART II.

Sonata in c major	Dussek
La Gaiété	Weber
Song, "Serenade"	Gounod
Waltz in E flat minor	Heller
Trio in G major, Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello	Haydn

When it is considered that all the above pieces were performed by Master Stanford from memory, it will be admitted as no mean proof of talent and industry, but it must be recorded in addition that a listener alone of whatever experience, not knowing of the youth, or seeing the performer would suppose an artist at the instrument who had passed through years of mature study. Neatness and precision, classic and elastic touch, expression and finish seem to have been bestowed by nature in this case, for Master Stanford plays with his head as well as with his hands. His performance of prelude and fugue was absolutely faultless, and Weber's "La Gaiété" quite enraptured his audience. The premature "aplomb" and steadiness displayed in the trio of Haydn were nothing short of wonderful, and such as many of riper years might take example from. In addition to his talent "comme executant" Master Stanford already displays a very high class feeling for composition, as evidenced in the song, "A Venetian dirge," one of many of equal merit from his pen. It only remains to wish him a great future and "may we live to see it." Mr. Lévey played the violin part, and Herr Elsner that of the violoncello in Haydn's trio.—Orchestra, June 11, 1864.

To return to the compositions of this youthful period; and in this connection there is a curious incident to relate. A friend of the Stanford family knew Mr. Gambier Parry, of Highnam Court. Upon one of his visits to Dublin, this friend said to Stanford père: "Ah! there's a boy in Gloucestershire who will put Charlie's nose out of joint." Little did the young Irish boy think that in after years he would be so closely associated with the Highnam youth at the Royal College of Music. Need we say that Charlie Stanford's boyish "bogey" was Hubert Parry? He met him first in 1877.

Two letters of this period may appropriately find a place here. The first, addressed to Mr. John Stanford, is from the poet, B. W. Procter ("Barry Cornwall"):—

32, Weymouth Street,
Portland Place, W.
8 Decr. 1865.

Dr. Sir,

The verses you refer to are quite at your service. I hope that your son will turn out a Mozart.

I am, Dr. Sir,
Yours sincerely and obediently.
B. W. Procter.

J. S. Stanford, Esq.

The second, from a fellow countryman—the genial, warm-hearted George A. Osborne—is highly characteristic of his Hibernian wit. The letter is addressed to "C. Stanford, Esq.," who was then thirteen years of age:—

22, Dorset Square, N.W.
March 7, 1866.

Brother Composer,

I received your Piano Forte piece, which is very pretty, and I have already played it to an admiring audience. I am not perhaps the best judge of your works, for I like you, and the rural tree, of which you are the fruit. Trying, as I do, to divest myself of my partiality, and merely considering you as a German celebrity—let us suppose for instance one Herr Knickerbockerfaustholder—I can really say, I am very much pleased with the composition.

As regards the song, "We bear her home," I have a stand up fight with F——, as I will keep it for myself; it suits my voice and as for the expression I throw into it, I should not mind singing it before any number of undertakers, tho' you, with a due appreciation of my powers, might consider it a bold undertaking.

I am,
Dear Brother in Apollo's bonds
Yours very sincerely
G. A. Osborne.

C. Stanford, Esq.

"ROTTEN OPERAS."

Young Stanford cannot say that he was without honour in his own city of Dublin. At a concert given by the University of Dublin Choral Society (for the particulars of which we are indebted to the kindness of Mr. Charles F. Draper, the Hon. Librarian), on February 15, 1867, a baritone solo with chorus, from one of the early "rotten" operas, was performed. Here are the words:—

Song and Chorus . . . . C. Villiers Stanford.

Heroes and Chieftains brave,
Whose warlike deeds with triumph crowned,
Are far throughout the world renowned,
Fill high, the brimming goblet drain,
Drink to the mighty Northman's fame,
Hurrah!

Chorus.

Fame to the hardy Sons of the North,
Dauntless of heart and strong of hand,
Like the wild storms of their native land—
Resistless in their might.
Onward they rush to the battle field,
Conquer or die—to none they yield—
Proudly their standard still shall wave,
Fame to the Northman brave,
Hurrah!

Digitized by Google

Firm as the sea-beat cliffs,
That bear unmoved the tempest's shock;
Danger we seek—at fear we mock;
Drink to the hour of victory,
Drink to the Northman proud and free!
Hurrah!

A contemporary criticism of the above composition may be quoted:—

The Kermesse chorus [from "Faust"] was followed by "Heroes and Chieftains brave," a song also sung by Mr. Kelly (and also with chorus), composed by Master Charles Villiers Stanford, a little boy of tender years, who continues to manifest not less remarkable talent as a composer than as a pianist, but who is, we are credibly informed, by no means to be ranked among "enfants terribles," those impossibly precocious children, those infant Mozarts, who are such a bore to everybody. Master Stanford, with all his ability, is a lively, natural, and utterly unaffected boy. His song consists of an Allegro maestoso in A major, relieved by episodes in the relative minor keys, and capped, as it were, by choral refrains of tenor and bass voices in unison, breaking forth into bold harmony at the conclusion.

At another Dublin concert in the sixties Tietjens sang a setting by him of Mary Queen of Scots' "O Domine Jesu," which had a violoncello obbligato played by Elsner, an excellent violoncellist in the Irish capital.

In 1862 Professor Stanford first crossed the Irish Channel. Upon his arrival in London he became a pupil of Mr. Arthur O'Leary for composition and of Mr. Ernst Pauer for pianoforte. He also made the acquaintance of H. F. Chorley and his red waistcoat, and, two years later (in 1864), he first met Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir George Grove, and the late Frederick Clay at John Scott Russell's house at Sydenham.

CAMBRIDGE.

But the most eventful period of his life began in the year 1870. He tried for a Classical Scholarship at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, but failed. But he obtained an Organ Scholarship at Queen's College, and matriculated in October, 1870, winning a classical scholarship in the following June. He took his B.A. degree in 1874, and he is not ashamed to say that he came out at the bottom of the list! His musical abilities seem to have been discovered very soon, as he appeared at a concert of the Cambridge University Musical Society—for which he was afterwards to do such great things—on November 30, 1870, in the capacity of a pianist, his solos on that début occasion being a Nachtstück of Schumann's and a waltz of Heller's. He speedily found an opening for his conducting skill as conductor of the Cambridge Amateur Vocal Guild, which he founded in order to introduce ladies into the chorus.

In the spring of 1873 Stanford migrated to Trinity, upon becoming organist of that College after the death of Dr. John Larkin Hopkins. He also became conductor of the Cambridge University Musical Society, the duties of which he discharged with conspicuous ability for twenty years. His first innovation was to admit ladies into the chorus of the Society, the fair sex having hitherto been kept beyond that pale. The first concert under the new conditions was given on May 27, 1873, when the then Professor of Music, Sterndale Bennett, conducted a performance of his "May Queen."

CAMBRIDGE RECOLLECTIONS.

The following recollections of Professor Stanford at Cambridge, kindly contributed by Mr. E. S. Thompson, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, may appropriately find a place at this point:—

Stanford came to Cambridge in the year 1870 as Organist Scholar of Queen's College. The plan of attracting to a college a young man of musical ability who desires to proceed to a degree, and is willing for a consideration amounting to a scholarship to perform the duties of organist, has been tried at various colleges with various success. Queen's was, I believe, the first College at Cambridge to try the experiment. Probably the authorities did not at first realize how big a fish they had caught. At any rate, to them belongs the credit of bringing to Cambridge the man who did so much for the cause of music there.

He soon attracted attention. Occasional special services and performances of sacred music in the Chapel gave evidence of his energy and ability as a choir-trainer and conductor. Presently, owing to the illness and subsequent death of Dr. John Larkin Hopkins, a vacancy occurred in the post of organist at Trinity College. The place was offered to Stanford, and to Trinity he migrated, and from that College took his degree. He at first held the post as an interim appointment; but before long was confirmed in it as a permanent office with the full stipend. The principal characteristic of his influence was its extraordinary stimulating power. He waked up musical enthusiasm wherever there was any latent. Some may have thought that he took a somewhat liberal view of the range of effects admissible on the organ. The late Master of Trinity, at a College Commemoration Dinner, is understood to have said, with carefully punctuated emphasis: "Mr. Stanford's playing always charms, and occasionally astonishes; and I may add that the less it astonishes, the more it charms."

His rooms in Trinity were in the staircase near the corner to the right, as you enter the Great Gate, and on the first floor. Professor Jebb, then one of the tutors who lived on the same staircase, was a truly sympathetic neighbour. Stanford had elected to compass a degree by means of the Classical Tripos. He knew a fair amount of Latin and Greek when he came up; but as time went on, and he felt more and more the exacting nature of his profession, the work began to gall, and during his last undergraduate year threats were heard more than once by his friends that he would throw the whole thing over. Fortunately other counsels prevailed. He was a candidate for the Tripos in 1874. No doubt, when the trial came, his real literary tastes served him in good stead, and his name will be found in the class list published in that year.

But Stanford's most important work at Cambridge was in connection with the University Musical Society. During the time before he became conductor the chorus consisted of men and boys. There were no ladies; and this, of course, much circumscribed the list of works performable by the Society. There was, however, another Society, the "Fitzwilliam Musical Society," established some years before, of which ladies were members. Stanford became a committee-man of this some little time before he succeeded, in 1873, to the command of the University Society. Very soon after this a bloodless revolution was effected. Ladies were admitted as Associates of the University Society, and the Fitzwilliam Society was merged in it. This commenced a new era. The conductor was ambitious, and the chorus did their best to rise to the occasion. Sometimes, no doubt, they did—to borrow an expressive phrase—"cut off a bigger chunk than they could chew"—possibly, for instance, when they attacked Schumann's "Faust." But the chorus knew their conductor, and knew that if anybody could pull them through, he would; and so somehow things went. The first important work of Stanford's performed by the Society was his setting of the 46th Psalm ("God is our Hope and Strength"), which was given on May 22, 1877,* with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Brahms's "Rhapsodie" (Op. 53) for alto solo and chorus of male voices, and Schumann's D minor Symphony. It was noticed more than once, when a composition of Stanford's was to be performed with some other choral work, how ready he was to risk the success of his own work rather than suffer imperfect preparation of the other.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The above interesting reminiscences may be supplemented by some further information, more especially in regard to the Cambridge University Musical Society and its enthusiastic conductor. The local interest was speedily extended to the metropolis. A professional orchestra from London was engaged in order to contribute to a worthier rendering of the important works performed. Moreover, the musical critics of the great London dailies went "up" on occasions of special interest duly to chronicle certain Cambridge concerts. It is impossible within the limits of the present article to give a detailed list of all the important works performed at the concerts of the Society. An enumeration of many of the works presented will be found in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," iv., 205*b* and 806*b*. The following is a record of works which had their first hearing in England at the Society's concerts:—

Bach.—Halt im Gedächtniss.
Brahms.—Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
—— Rhapsodie. Op. 53.
Cowen.—Symphony in F.†
Joachim.—Elegiac Overture.†
Kiel.—Requiem.
Leo.—Dixit Dominus.
Parry.—Symphony in F.
—— "Lotos Eaters."†
Schumann.—"Faust." Part III.
——Fest Ouverture. Op. 123.
Goring Thomas.—Suite de Ballet.

Amongst important revivals should be mentioned Handel's "Semele" and "Hercules" and Astorga's "Stabat Mater."

HONORARY DEGREES AT CAMBRIDGE.

Other important events of the Stanford régime were in connection with the conferment of honorary degrees upon distinguished foreign musicians. The first of these functions took place on March 8, 1877, when Joseph Joachim was duly capped. In the evening of that day he conducted his Elegiac Overture and played Beethoven's Violin Concerto. At this concert Brahms's C minor Symphony (No. 1), then in MS., was performed for the first time in England. Fourteen years later, on June 16, 1891, Antonin Dvorák became a Doctor in Music in the University of Cambridge; and in June, 1893—as a fitting conclusion to Professor Stanford's unwearying and efficient labours on behalf of the Cambridge University Musical Society—similar distinctions were conferred on Max Bruch, Arrigo Boïto, Camille Saint-Saëns, and Peter Iljitsch Tschaïkowsky—Edvard Grieg, who was prevented from being present on that occasion, received his honorary degree in the following year. Two native composers were also similarly honoured—Sir Hubert Parry, in 1883, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in 1888. It is impossible to estimate the value of Stanford's services to the cause of music during the twenty-three years of his residence at Cambridge. His influence on the progress of music in the University itself was not only unique in the annals of any University, but it had far-reaching results in furthering the progress of the art beyond the confines of his Alma mater.

STUDIES IN GERMANY.

Cambridge, even with its rarefied atmosphere of culture—musical and otherwise—offered no facilities for those musical studies necessary to the complete equipment of either graduates or undergraduates as professional musicians. Their technical training had to be acquired beyond the confines of the University. Having taken his B.A. degree, the clever young organist of Trinity College Chapel obtained leave of absence from his organist duties for a portion of the years 1874-5-6, in order that he might reap the musical and linguistical advantages which a residence abroad affords by further studying the art in Germany. He had previously been abroad in the autumn of 1873, when, at the Schumann Festival, held at Bonn, he met Brahms, who became his idol. For two years (1875-6) the Cambridge graduate studied composition with Carl Reinecke, at Leipzig, and in 1877 with Friedrich Kiel, at Berlin—Kiel, by the way, making his tenth and last teacher of music.

In 1878 he married Miss Jennie Wetton, fourth daughter of the late Champion Wetton, of Joldwynds, Surrey, took his M.A. degree, and settled down at Cambridge, where for the next sixteen years he was a prominent figure in 'Varsity life. His popular Service in B flat first saw the light in 1879, and year in and year out he poured forth one composition after another—most of them of large dimensions—with remarkable rapidity. He first became widely known as a composer in 1876, when he obtained the second prize in a symphony competition initiated by the Alexandra Palace Company. Here are the particulars as recorded in The Musical Times of that year:—

The authorities of the Alexandra Palace offer two prizes of £20 and £5 respectively, together with a certificate, for the best two Orchestral Symphonies to be written by British composers. . . . The work which gains the first prize is to be performed at one of the Saturday concerts, and the second, if of sufficient merit [!] will also be presented to the public. Manuscripts must be sent in to Mr. H. Weist Hill, Alexandra Palace, on or before March 13th [1876].

At the Alexandra Palace Symphony Competition, the first prize has been awarded to Francis Davenport, and the second to C. Villiers Stanford. Judges: Professor George Alexander Macfarren, Mus. Doc., and Professor Joseph Joachim. There were 38 Symphonies submitted.

OPERAS.

The domain of opera has always had a strong fascination for the subject of this sketch.

He composed his first important opera in 1877, to a libretto after Moore by his Cambridge friend, Mr. W. Barclay Squire, entitled "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan." This opera was produced at Hanover, under the conductorship of Ernst Frank, on February 6, 1881. Moreover, it was the first première of any English opera abroad. Three years later (1884), Professor Stanford enjoyed the unique experience of having two operas produced within ten days of each other! The first was "Savonarola" (libretto by Gilbert à'Beckett), first performed at the Stadt-Theater, Hamburg, and the second, "The Canterbury Pilgrims" (libretto also by Gilbert à'Beckett), produced at Covent Garden by Carl Rosa—these two operas had their initial representations on April 18 and 28 (1884) respectively. "Savonarola" met with an undoubted success in Hamburg, where it was performed four times within a fortnight. Moreover, several of the leading musical critics of Germany wrote in enthusiastic and appreciative terms of the Irish composer's work. Unfortunately, however, the London performance of the opera proved to be terribly disappointing. It was given—and in the German language too!—by the German Opera Company, under Hans Richter, at Covent Garden, on July 9, 1884. One adverse circumstance after another, like unknown rocks in a stormy sea, conspired to wreck the opera that had been so favourably received in Hamburg. This biographical sketch of its composer provides an opportunity of placing on record the true fact of the case, obvious from Riccius' criticism at Hamburg—that it was not the opera itself, but its deplorably inadequate representation in London that proved its ruin. "The Canterbury Pilgrims," under Carl Rosa's vigorous direction, fared differently. It "was produced," recorded The Musical Times of June, 1884, "with a success which adds one more to the many recent proofs of the talent existing amongst our native artists, and the readiness of English audiences to acknowledge it." "Shamus O'Brien" (Opera Comique, London, March 2, 1896) provided its composer with a fine opportunity for the display of his native humour in sparkling, characteristic music.

"Incidental music" to plays has provided Professor Stanford with some notable opportunities for the exercise of his talents in descriptive music. His first effort in that direction was the music to Tennyson's "Queen Mary," produced at the Lyceum in 1876, of which more anon. Seventeen years later (1893) the same poet's "Becket" was similarly treated, also at the theatre so closely associated with Sir Henry Irving. What more natural than that he should compose music to two Greek classics—the "Eumenides" of Æschylus and the "Œdipus" of Sophocles, produced at Cambridge in 1885 and 1887 respectively? Another composition calls for special mention, by reason of its close connection with Cambridge—the "Installation Ode" of 1892, to greet the newly-made Chancellor of the University, the Duke of Devonshire. The curious part of the music is that not a single bar of it was upon original themes. In fact, from a musical point of view, the Ode might be regarded as a series of variations on "Gaudeamus igitur." A critic, in describing the work, said:

> Two points in the score call for special notice. The first is where, after an allusion in the poem to the Vice-Chancellor of the University, the composer has introduced, as a counterpoint to the "Gaudeamus" melody, the tune of "D'ye ken John Peel," the appropriateness of which lies in the fact that the present holder of that office is a namesake of the disciple of Nimrod immortalised in the ballad. This is as effective as it is ingenious, but it is equalled by a remarkably clever orchestral "Quodlibet," consisting of the combined melodies, "Rule, Britannia," "Auld lang Syne," and "Let Erin remember the days of old," and provoked by a reference to "the triple realm bound to the British Crown." The Ode being intended to follow immediately the Academic Festival Overture of Brahms, the last bars of that work (which, it will be remembered, are founded on "Gaudeamus igitur") are, with the German composer's readily-accorded permission, employed by Dr. Stanford in his final chorus, with the addition of vocal parts.

EVENTS.

The more recent events of Professor Stanford's life are so familiar to the public that it is only necessary to record some of the more outstanding incidents, especially as these will be supplemented by a reference to his festival works and a complete list of his important compositions. In 1883 he was created an Oxford Doctor in Music, a compliment by the sister University as graceful as it was merited. The same year witnessed his appointment as Professor of Composition and Conductor of the Orchestra at the Royal College of Music on the occasion of its opening. Amongst his pupils at Kensington have been Hamish MacCunn, Charles Wood, Walford Davies, R. H. Walthew, S. P. Waddington, S. Coleridge-Taylor, W. E. Hurlstone, and others whose works have brought honour to themselves and redounded to the credit of their teacher. As conductor of the orchestra at the College, Stanford exercises an important influence on the young people over whom he so ably presides. He not only fires them with his own enthusiasm—and how tremendously enthusiastic they are—but he has brought the performances of those boys and girls to a very high pitch of excellence; in fact, they would put many experienced orchestral players to shame in technique and especially in throwing themselves heart and soul into their work.

Oddly enough, the odd years seem to have been eventful years to him. In 1885, upon the resignation of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, he was appointed conductor of the Bach Choir, where he found, and still finds, splendid scope for his musical sympathies and technical attainments. In 1887 he was appointed Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, in succession to Professor G. A. Macfarren, deceased; in 1892 he was elected corresponding member of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique, Paris, and an honorary member of the Beethoven Haus at Bonn; and in June, 1897, he was appointed conductor of the Leeds Philharmonic Society. He is a member of the Athenæum Club, having been elected under Rule II. (persons distinguished in literature, science or art), and a Director of the Philharmonic Society.

The same year (Richter concert, May 27, 1887) saw the production of his most popular symphony—that in F minor, known as the "Irish" Symphony, in which he introduced touches of those delightful melodies of his native land that he loves so well. This symphony has, it is scarcely necessary to say, found its way across the seas—to Germany, Italy, and America—where it has been received with gratifying appreciation of its composer's genius. The Jubilee Ode ("Carmen Sæculare"), to which we shall refer later, also belongs to this year. In 1888 he was made a Doctor in Music (honoris causâ) of his own University; and his "Irish" Symphony was introduced by Hans von Bülow in Hamburg and Berlin. In the following year (on January 14, 1889) he gave an orchestral concert in Berlin, consisting entirely of his own compositions, when the programme included his fourth Symphony and his Suite in D for violin and orchestra, the solo part being played by the same violinist the sight of whom, thirty or so years before, had made him cry—his friend, Professor Joachim. In 1896, in conjunction with his fellow countryman Plunket Greene and with Leonard Borwick, he gave concerts of native music at various places abroad, and last Christmas he further upheld the claims of English music at concerts both in Brussels and Amsterdam.

BRAHMS, BROWNING, AND VON BÜLOW.

It would be quite possible to fill many columns of The Musical Times with letters that Professor Stanford has received from various distinguished persons. Here are four specimens. The first is from Brahms, acknowledging the receipt of a copy of the Professor's "Irish Songs and Ballads:—

[Translated.]

Postmark: Vienna, 15. 3. 95.

Honoured Sir,

Your parcel has given me extraordinary pleasure, and I thank you from my heart.

I immediately looked up my beautiful old edition of Moore, to enable me to make comparisons, and thus better to compare and judge your work.

I had not forgotten my promise; but, unfortunately, I no longer possess the desired portrait, and in place of it I send you two others. I trust that this substitution will satisfy you.

Heartfelt thanks,

Yours,

J. Brahms.

The next, from Robert Browning, speaks for itself:—

19, Warwick Crescent, W.
Nov. 24th, 1884.

My dear Dr. Stanford,

I beg to thank you heartily for your setting of my little poem ["Prospice"] never was poem more honoured than by your admirable music; which, though I have as yet only "tried it over" by my eye and in my mind, I satisfy myself is entirely original and characteristically true to the feeling the words are meant to convey. The whole of my poetry should be at your service—"to serve thyself, my cousin!"—were you able to illustrate it so happily.

Pray believe me, dear Dr. Stanford,

Yours very sincerely,

Robert Browning.

The two following letters from Hans von Bülow lose none of their characteristic comicalities by reason of their being written in the English language, or some approach thereto:—

Hamburg. 13th March, 1888.

Dear Sir,

Illustrissimo!

A few hours after your kind note I received also the three piano scores you announced. Accept my heartiest thanks for the friendly record you kept of the german conductor of the Irish Symphony.

In spite of the general funeralism* I must start to-morrow morning for Berlin to prepare the next Philh. concert. Accordingly to the exceptional circumstances whilst travelling I shall read your melodrams which most highly excite my interest.

As for my trip to London nothing as yet is definitely fixed. In no case I could come before the 1st of June, the month of birds, cats and poets being devoted to the cure of my neuralgies at Wiesbaden. I should feel most happy if during my stay in L[ondon] I could be of any use to the ears of your residence. Please dispose of my ten fingers—and do not mind your treasurers nightmares. A visit to Cambridge would not be "matter of business" for your most sincere admirer

Hans v. Bülow.

Will you kindly excuse the involuntary laconisms of this line?

Hamburg. 5th December, 1889.

Dear Master!

Fancy—but to-day I discovered your kind letter and the magnificent "garter"† you have bestowed upon me. Both got astray in the depths of the trunk which my last tournée (alla Sir Charles) had been accompanied by. Please accept my heartiest thanks for the honor you judged myself worthy of. United with Brahms' Op. 108, certainly this Trio of yours is the best music the poor would*not*be-composer's name has been adorned with. Good gracious! what wonderful progress your country is making owing to your genius since the days of . . .

Of course I shall avail of the next good (not best) opportunity of playing your work in public, be it here or elsewhere.

The enclosed scraps are telling of my πολυπραγμοσύνη [bustling activity], apologising for the brevity of my wits.

"Faute de mieux"—please accept for your album the best the last likeness of our Hector [Berlioz]: it has been made at his last journey in Petersbourg. As the "cast" (how ought I to call it) was exhausted, I had it reproduced in Jonathan's Continent.

Once more—with heartiest thanks and best wishes of your health, the brain's as well as the soul's health,

I remain, dear Sir,

Your truly devoted admirer,

Hans v. Bülow.

Please don't shoot the organist: he is "doing his best"—alias: excuse my bad english; I lack leisure for consulting the "Antibarbarus."

TENNYSON.

It is always a gratifying feature in recording—be it ever so briefly—the life-work of one of our representative musicians when his work has brought him into contact with representative men in other spheres of artistic production. This has been the case in a marked degree in regard to Professor Stanford's intercourse with Tennyson. He first came into pleasant relations with the late Laureate as far back as 1874, through Tennyson's sons, Hallam and Lionel, who were then undergraduates of Trinity College, Cambridge. At the poet's own request, Stanford composed the incidental music for the production of "Queen Mary" at the Lyceum, under Mrs. Bateman's management, in 1876. When Tennyson heard that the music would not be performed because the necessary space for the orchestra would necessitate the removal of two rows of stalls, he himself offered to pay for the said two rows of stalls for two or three nights, in order that the music should not be sacrificed. But his offer was refused by the management.

Tennyson, although he knew nothing about the mere technicalities of the art, had a great instinct for music. He used to say that most people who had set his songs to music made the notes go up when they should go down! Declamation in music was a very strong point with him. For example, in his setting of "The Revenge," in the phrase "Was he devil or man? He was devil for aught they knew" (pp. 40 and 41 of Novello's octavo score of the work), Stanford originally wrote a high note (E flat) for the first "devil," and a lower note (C) the second time the word occurred: but Tennyson asked him to invert the order of notes, and to give the higher note to the second "devil" of the phrase!—

He was also very particular—and rightly so—about a clear enunciation of the words in singing. In order that he might hear the quartet from "The Voyage of Maeldune" ("The undersea isle"), the composer arranged for four amateurs to sing the music to the poet. When they had finished their performances, Tennyson complimented (?) them with the remark: "I couldn't hear a word you said from beginning to end." His appreciation of music was evidenced in the following remark he made to Professor Stanford in reference to the same quartet, he said: "I like the way your music rippled away at the end."

Professor Stanford has so long held a distinguished and acknowledged place as a representative native composer that any restatement of an accepted truism would be superfluous, if not, indeed, presumptuous at this time of day. But it is interesting to know that Tennyson also held this opinion, and the incident, with its gratifying sequel, may fitly conclude this biographical sketch of Charlie Stanford, to use the familiar designation of his intimate friends.

It was at Tennyson's special, if not urgent request that Stanford should compose the music to his Ode "Carmen Sæculare," written in 1887 to commemorate the Jubilee of Queen Victoria. This he did, and the Ode was duly performed, with great éclat, at Buckingham Palace, in the presence of Her Majesty the Queen, on May 11, 1887. Her admiration of the work found appreciative expression in a letter Her Majesty afterwards wrote to Lord Tennyson,* in which she said: "We greatly admired the music, which was very descriptive and well adapted to the words."

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

V.

Musicians at Play.

One day in almost the latest of the "sixties" three men—the Tenor, the Bass, and the Critic—might have been seen to meet in the large hall of Euston Station, and afterwards to take tickets for a point in North Wales. The object of their journey was not entirely unconnected with business. The Tenor and the Bass, for example, were under engagement to sing at a certain Eisteddfod; the Critic, on his part, hoped to make some "copy" out of the excursion in more ways than one. All were in high spirits; the London season had closed; there were fair autumn days ahead, and due leisure in which to enjoy them. Under such circumstances, although, according to the teaching of Mark Tapley, there was no credit in being jolly, the trio of travellers, credit or not, felt somewhat like boys just loosed from school, ripe for any extravagance. According to some authorities, there is always a tendency in nature to revert to the original type. The cultivated rose, if left to itself, goes back to its pristine wildness, and I have heard that the primitive nigger, educated to teach his kind and to be among them a "pioneer of civilisation," has been known to cast off the garments of the white man, assume the next-to-nothing of his old state, and worship the god of his people with the rest. However this may be, there are certainly conditions under which man relapses into boyhood, forgetting the gravity of years. Thus did Mr. Pickwick, at Dingley Dell, when he went down the slide prepared by Sam Weller and the Fat Boy, and was told by the inimitable Cockney servant to "keep the pot a-bilin'." Wherefore, should it turn out in the course of this paper that the Tenor, the Bass, and the Critic followed Mr. Weller's advice, though not on ice, they, or such of them as survive, can point to the universality of their experience, and be unashamed.

The whole significance of that laughing tour turned upon a question regarding the whereabouts of a certain Brass Tap, and the legend of the Brass Tap originated a year earlier at the Caermarthen Eisteddfod, as to which I have already had something to say in the course of these recollections. I regret that, at the meeting in question, a pretended candidate for Gorsedd honours sent in as an exercise some absurd doggerel, in which a brass tap figured. The lines, because of their ridiculous character, which was, moreover, not devoid of humour, "caught on," remained in memory, and suddenly broke out again as the Tenor, the Bass, and the Critic journeyed onward. Exactly where they came to the top I do not recollect, nor does it matter. Enough that the process of evolution, to which every thought becomes subject in the human mind, resulted in an overwhelming desire to know where the Brass Tap could be found. The craving in question first took possession of the Tenor; then making itself evident in a mild form, as when, for example, he would put his head out of the carriage window and question railway officials, or any people on the platform. The Tenor had wonderful command of his features, the perfect gravity of which deceived the stranger and led to the most ludicrous scenes. Not that he succeeded everywhere. On one occasion the Tenor fixed upon a rustic standing opposite the carriage, and demanded, in what he thought to be the vernacular: "Th' 'asnt seed a brass tap about here anywhere, 'ast?" The yokel was by no means taken in, though the Tenor's head was as his country friend fiercely exclaimed: "I'll brass tap thy yed if thee geest me any of thy jaw." This incident led to a cessation of efforts in local dialect, which is apt to vary and to betray. But enquiry for the Tap only took safer forms, and the holiday fun went on. Here and there stationmasters were called for and anxiously required to say whether a brass tap had been picked up in or about the premises. No; they had not heard of such a thing being found, but they would enquire; while from the depths of the carriage the Bass and the Critic groaned in the agony of efforts to keep down an explosion of mirth.

In due course the three travellers reached the little town at which the Eisteddfod was to be held. The name of the place has escaped me at the moment of writing, but I know that it is near to Denbigh by token that when the Tenor went up to enquire about rooms, he returned to his waiting friends with news that sleeping accommodation could be had, but that, in each case, the bed would have to be shared with a Welsh bard. Promptly the three took train to Denbigh, and tried the "Bull," a hostelry famous for its old-fashioned comfort. There the Bass came to the front (he had been at the "Bull" before), and in deep, sonorous tones declared to Mrs. Jones, the more than worthy landlady, "We will take three rooms for the week." "I don't know as you will," was the retort, but Mrs. J., saying this, only made a harmless demonstration of independence. She received the would-be guests to the hospitality of her house, and lavished upon them so much care and attention that at least one of the three connects the "Bull" at Denbigh with all that is excellent in British hotels. From the county town the trio went forward and backward each day, discharging their respective duties. Was the Brass Tap forgotten under pressure of business? By no means. The fun became faster as the days went on. One morning an advertisement appeared in the local sheet announcing that such an implement had been lost, and adding that the finder, on taking it to the artists' room at the Eisteddfod pavilion, would receive a reward of ten shillings. Several brass taps, I need hardly state, were presented in the course of the day, but none of them turned out to be the right one, and the bringers, who had simply been "trying it on," went sorrowfully away. Meanwhile the advertisement excited immense interest in the artists' room, the curiosity of Edith Wynne being vivacious in the extreme. Why should anyone in the little company carry about a brass tap? Of what kind was it that the thing could not be replaced for less than ten shillings? Such were the questions that passed from one to another, the Tenor and the Bass being as much concerned as any to get at the facts. Of course, nothing was discovered, and interest began to decline, when the jocund plotters resorted to another device. The Eisteddfod town, like many others, boasted a public crier, whose duty and advantage it was to make known by ring of bell and voice of proclamation such facts or intentions as his employers wished to publish. Secretly approaching that functionary, the three friends engaged him to perambulate the thoroughfares, especially those leading to or near the pavilion, and make known that still ten shillings awaited the fortunate finder of the missing implement. The crier did his duty like a man. His bell rang sonorously up and down the streets, and his voice announced, in Welsh and English, the pressing need for a brass tap in the artists' room. Curiosity flamed up again, stimulated by the anxious efforts of those at the bottom of the hoax to know what it all meant. But it could get nothing to feed upon. The Tenor's face was as impenetrable as that of a sphynx; the large eyes of the Bass expressed nothing but mild wonder; the Critic was to all appearance unconcerned. Then came the end of the Eisteddfod and, still unsatisfied, the singers and players went their several ways.

Yet the farce of the Brass Tap had not come to an end. The tour of the three friends comprehended a wide extent of country, and wherever they went enquiry was rife. Hotel waiters, the Boots, and even august proprietors and managers were anxiously consulted as to the missing treasure, but there were cases in which even the dramatic powers of the Tenor seemed to fail. Brass taps are common enough, thought some of the interlocutors, and if they were not, why should three tourists feel such a consuming desire to regain possession of a particular example? The Critic often watched, with restrained but deep amusement, the faces of those with whom the Tenor or the Bass held consultation, especially when a film of suspicion began to cloud the theretofore sympathetic eye. However, all passed off well. Those who thought they were being "had" acted upon Mr. Edmund Sparkler's admirable principle, "Why row?" Those who were free from doubt promised aid which they did not know could only be futile. In some cases, written placards were used to proclaim the loss of the three tourists, and I am not quite sure but that the Tenor affixed one of these to the shanty on the top of Snowdon, as though to advise an observant heaven that something was wanted down below. Why the present writer cannot be positive as to the point in question is that the entire party did not succeed in getting to the summit. Llanberis hotels in those days were not particularly obliging. They would not, for example, provide visitors with breakfast who wished to see sunrise from the top of the mountain. In this category were the Tenor, the Bass, and the Critic; each of whom heard with dismay that bread and water would be left for him, with which he must break his fast. Now bread and water, under conceivable circumstances, are a comfort and even a luxury, but they do not go far up a mountain side before sunrise. Anyhow, the climbers had reached no more than half way ere the Bass, who had most to carry as concerns the burden of the flesh, showed signs of giving up. He dropped farther and farther to the rear till, at length, the Critic, looking back, beheld him seated, with that in his attitude which seemed to express an invincible resolve to go no higher. What, under such circumstances, could the Critic do (he was himself pretty well spent) but stand by a prostrate companion? All duty and inclination prompted to a course so consistent with the obligations of one human being to another. On the opposite hand, what was there in a sunrise that could not be seen later? The Critic, feeling the power of these considerations, descended to the level of his friend, and, in order that there might be no invidious comparisons, dropped down beside him. The Tenor, lithe and active, went on up the mountain, reached the top, and there, for anything I know, enquired for the lost Tap on the highest available spot of earth.

In process of time, it became the duty of the Tenor, the Bass, and the Critic to travel South, cross the Bristol Channel, and do duty in the West of England. Along this route the humour of the Brass Tap showed no signs of exhaustion. At Pontypool Road Station a bill announcing the usual reward was affixed to the platform wall, the Brass Tap, in that case, to be presented at the stationmaster's office, where the ten shillings would be paid. So on and on, with various devices, till the entire campaign closed with the display of another bill on the steamer plying between Swansea and Ilfracombe. Once on Devonian ground the whole stream of nonsense dried up. The Tenor and the Bass had to sing in an opera at Plymouth, and the gravity of men and of artists banished the sportiveness of boys. But, as Joe Gargery was wont to remark, "What larks!" Of the three friends two survive, and they are not ashamed of the recrudescence of long-lost juvenile spirits, which, for them, turned North Wales into a playground, made Mirth their constant companion, and Laughter holding both his sides. Should any serious reader reproach them as foolish and undignified, they beg to remind him, without applying the lines to themselves, that—

> "A little nonsense now and then
> Is relished by the best of men."

THE CATHEDRAL ORGANIST AS HE WAS.

Lincoln, like many of the cathedrals that are our proud boast and the envy of our American cousins, possesses old records of peculiarly quaint interest. In regard to the musical history of the stately fane, the Rev. Canon Maddison, one of the priest-vicars, has gathered much curious information from the Chapter Acts, which date from the twelfth century. We propose to give a few specimens of Canon Maddison's researches, which may appropriately form a supplement to the account (in another column) of the opening of the new organ in Lincoln Cathedral.

In 1311 occurs the first notice of an organ. A fee of 20 shillings was paid to Thomas de Ledenham, Vicar, for taking care of the organs, blowing and cleaning them. It is not quite clear whether he actually blew them in person, or merely saw to the proper supply of wind being provided; most probably the latter was the case, as the blowing of the organ in later days is said to have devolved on the Poor Clerks, and a Vicar's more important duties would stand in the way of his being so employed.

It is quite evident that organs were cheaper 500 years ago than they are at present; they were probably very much smaller, as we learn that—

On April 24, 1428, the Chapter met and decided that nine pounds should be expended in purchasing new organs for the Chapel of St. John the Baptist, where the Mass of the Blessed Virgin was daily celebrated "cum nota" (i.e., musically), and in repairing the great organs in the Choir.

Fourteen years later it is recorded that—

On the 10th September, 1442, the Dean and Chapter, after full consultation, unanimously agreed that organs of a better kind should be put up in the great Choir before the ensuing Christmas; and a bill was drawn up between the Chapter and one Arnald Organer, of Norwich, by which the latter covenanted to do it for five marks, which were to be paid him out of the Fabric Chest by the hands of Robert Patryngton and . . . . . Boston, Vicars.

Even allowing for the difference in the value of money at that time as compared with the present day, the salary of the organist of Lincoln Cathedral in 1536 cannot be deemed excessive, as Robert Dowffe, or Dove, received "£2 a year for playing the organ at the Mass of the Virgin, and £1 6s. 8d. for doing the same at the Mass of Jesus." But the Rev. Mr. Dove held other offices in the Cathedral, which brought up his annual emoluments to £15 8s. 5d., with rooms rent free. A side light on the manner of performing Divine service is furnished by the following extract:—

On the 29th September, 1570, an interesting Act of Chapter was passed, directing that the organist was to set the tune before the commencement of the Te Deum, and the Canticle of Zachary at morning prayer, and at evening prayer before the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis; and to accompany the anthem. We may note here that the Psalms were then sung unaccompanied, and that the Benedictus was usually sung in place of the Jubilate.

The organists from time to time gave trouble, as the following showeth:—

On the 30th March, 1611, Mr. Thomas Kingston was arraigned before the Chapter, "for beating the boys and calling Mr. Dye, the master of the Choristers, an Ass! He confessed all the misdemeanours charged against him, and submitted to the censure of the Chapter. Whereupon they gave him an admonition, and gave him order to amend upon pain of being turned out and deprived."

This "talking to" does not seem to have had any permanent effect, as Mr. Organist Kingston was again admonished in 1615 on this charge:—

"He ys verye often drunke, and by means thereof he hathe by unorderly playing on the organs putt the quire out of time and disordered them."

It is not surprising to learn that this tipsy "unorderly" player was soon replaced by "a superior" organist, John Wanlesse. His salary was £20 per annum.

There are two curious entries relating to another inebriated organist, whose patronymic was Mudd. The Precentor, who was not above making a pun, thus wrote to the Dean about the organist, the date of his letter being March 14, 1662-3:—

Mr. Mudd hath been so debauched these Assizes, and hath so abused Mr. Derby [an organ builder], that he will hardly be persuaded to stay to finish his worke unlesse

Digitized by Google

Mudd bee removed. And I have stuck in the same Mudd too [naughty Mr. Precentor!]; for he hath abused me above hope of Pardon. I wish you would be pleased to send us downe an able and more civill organist.

Two days later the Precentor again wrote to Mr. Dean on the same muddy, or drink-muddy subject—

Yesterday Mr. Mudd shewed the effects of his last weeke's tipling, for when Mr. Joynes was in the midst of his sermon, Mudd fell a singing aloud, insomuch as Mr. Joynes was compelled to stopp; all the auditorie gazed and wondered what was the matter, and at length some neere him, stopping his mouth, silenced him, and then Mr. Joynes proceeded; but this continued for the space of neere halfe a quarter of an houre. So that now wee dare trust him no more with our organ, but request you (if you can) to helpe us to another; and with what speed maybe.

There seems to have been some discord, if not an apparent lack of "decency and order," in the conduct of the Cathedral services in the year 1771, as—

On the 10th September, Lloyd Raynor, the organist, was arraigned and reproved for playing one anthem, while Mr. Binns was singing another! Raynor, for insolence, was suspended from his office till he apologized. Thirteen years later Mr. Raynor was expelled, but £10 a year pension was allowed to him, as he had "submitted": the pension, however, was discontinued after one year.

The doings, or rather the misdoings, of these "chief musicians" were characteristic of the dissipated customs of the periods in which they lived. It is a matter of supreme satisfaction that the Cathedral organists of the present day take a more exalted view of their important office. It should not be forgotten, by the way, that William Byrd was appointed organist of Lincoln Cathedral about the year 1563. He remained at Lincoln for some years, but no trace of his residence there has been found in the Chapter records. Canon Maddison says that Byrd "held the double post of organist and Magister Choristorum in Cantu." Curiously enough, for nearly three centuries—from the time that Byrd became a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, in 1569, down to 1850—the two posts of organist and master of the choristers were, with a few exceptions, held by separate persons at Lincoln Cathedral.

THE Hebdomadal Council of the University of Oxford has rejected the scheme of compulsory residence at the University on the part of those desirous of taking degrees in music. Thus the present conditions, which have existed for four hundred years, remain unaltered. Sir Frederick Bridge, who has been the prime mover in the opposition to the scheme on behalf of the profession generally, is much to be congratulated on the success of his efforts. The following extracts from a pamphlet on the subject prepared by some of the signatories will be read with interest:—

A Memorial signed by 170 Graduates of Oxford holding Degrees in Arts and Music, protesting against a proposed change in the Regulations under which Degrees in Music are conferred, has been presented to the Hebdomadal Council by Sir Frederick Bridge, Mus.D. Oxon., and Gresham Professor of Music.

. . . . . .

It is contended that the alteration of the practice which has obtained at the University for four hundred years would be a break in the long continuity, not to the benefit of the Candidates, the Art, or the University itself; it would also deprive an important profession of an ancient right.

. . . . . .

From time to time the University in its wisdom has brought the requirements for obtaining a Degree in Music into consonance with the progress of Music itself. Music cannot be learnt by attending Lectures; it is an Art as well as a Science, and those seeking Degrees are rightly required to display a practical knowledge of that Art.

. . . . . .

Some years ago, mainly owing to the representations of Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, the late Professor, it was required that the candidate before presenting himself for examination in Music, should pass Responsions, or the Preliminary Examination provided for Students in Music, which includes one classical and one foreign language. The institution of this Arts test has been cheerfully accepted as a corollary of the higher education now universally demanded.

In addition to this historic view of the features attached to the Oxford Degrees in Music, it is necessary something should be said on the question of enforcing Residence, as is proposed. Dr. Prout, the Dublin Professor of Music, has remarked that if the suggested change be effected, it will certainly exclude the very class for whom Degrees in Music are intended, and by whom those distinctions are most required—viz., the great body of Professional Musicians.

The Signatories believe that it cannot be the desire of the Hebdomadal Council that the University should be indifferent to those obtaining their living by the profession of Music, and thus abate its influence and control over the Art in this country, by providing a scheme only fitted for a few cultured amateurs and leisured dilettanti to profit by. . . . If arguments were required to show that it is not necessary for men to take an Arts Degree before going up for Music, there may be noted the patent fact, that the Professor and Choragus of the University, Sir John Stainer and Sir Hubert Parry, both took the Degree of Mus. Bac. before they came up to reside for the Arts course. . . . If in connection with the Faculty of Music the University established and supported a first-class school, where Music could be learnt historically, theoretically, and practically, with technical instruction on the various instruments; and if in addition to these requisites there were provided opportunities of hearing good performances of the accepted masterpieces—then this matter would wear a different aspect.

THE Royal Choral Society proposes, on January 2, to present Handel's "Messiah" in as nearly as possible the form in which it was written. The performance will be complete in every detail. The edition of the work to be used has been prepared under the joint supervision of several men who have long been anxious for such a performance. Among these experts is notably Mr. T. W. Bourne, who for many years has made a careful study of "The Messiah," and who has, in fact, edited the vocal and most of the instrumental portions; also Mr. John E. Borland and Sir Frederick Bridge himself, who will, of course, conduct on the above interesting occasion. It may be added that Sir George Grove wrote to Sir F. Bridge, soon after he had been appointed conductor of the Royal Choral Society, asking him to give this matter his early and serious attention.

THE orchestra at the Royal Albert Hall will consist of

38 Violins,	12 Oboes,
12 Violas,	6 Bassoons,
12 Violoncellos,	2 Horns,
12 Double Basses,	2 Trumpets, and Drums,

thus constituting a band of the exact proportions of Handel's orchestra. This body of instrumentalists will practically work as a double orchestra, one section reinforcing the other, as directed by the composer. In the course of preparing the new edition of the band parts, several erroneous readings have been discovered and corrected, and in many instances Handel's own bowing, often strikingly superior to that hitherto in use, has been restored.

The sources from which this new performing edition has been derived are—

i. The Autograph.
ii. The Dublin MS.
iii. The Foundling Hospital band parts.
iv. The original edition published by Walsh.

Each of these contributes something, the autograph being the final reference in all questions of reading. The Dublin MS. (the original conducting score) furnishes directions as to the employment of the band in performance, besides giving second versions of several movements which in their first form did not satisfy the composer: the Foundling Hospital parts give the wind parts till lately supposed to be lost. The horn parts alone remain uncertain; but Professor Prout's suggestion (now to be adopted), that they doubled the trumpets, is so well in keeping with Handel's use that its correctness may be assumed. Lastly, the original edition furnishes some slight insight into the amount of freedom with which the score was interpreted in performance, and, by its ample figuring, the use made of the organ and harpsichord in accompanying. With regard to the last-named, the organ will do double duty, the harpsichord being, for obvious reasons, out of the question. Mr. T. W. Bourne, in conjunction with Mr. John E. Borland, has written a special organ part for use at the performance on the second day of 1899—a performance that will be anticipated with much interest.

"Musical and other services in St. Paul's Cathedral" is the title of the report to the Dean and Chapter, chiefly in relation to services held in St. Paul's between Easter, 1897, and Easter, 1898, by the Succentor, the Rev. Lewis Gilbertson. This quarto book of seventy pages mainly consists of the lists of services, anthems, ordinary services, special services, &c., all such information being valuable for reference to those in authority in "choirs and places where they sing." But of more general interest is the historical portion, especially in regard to changes in the personnel of the musical staff since 1890, when the last Report was issued, and also of the special and orchestral services held within the Cathedral walls. The various "Lists" bear testimony to the wide eclecticism shown in the selection of the music sung at St. Paul's. The efficiency which characterises its rendering—even in the minutest details—at our Metropolitan Cathedral is too well known to need further commendation. The esprit de corps, which seems to animate every member of the musical staff, finds most gratifying acknowledgment in the Succentor's concluding words of his admirable report to the Dean and Chapter. He says:—

In conclusion, it is a pleasure to the writer to express his conviction, that there has never been a time when the members of the Choir were animated by a better spirit than at the present—a happy state of things which at once makes work with them a pleasure, and assures the maintenance of that high standard of efficiency which is their legacy from the past.

Sir George Martin, under the heading "Appendix VI.," contributes a most interesting History of the organ in St. Paul's Cathedral, together with a specification of the new instrument, now being completed by Mr. Willis. In regard to Father Smith's old organ, Sir George says:—

The first entry I find in the account books is:—
"Between 1st November 1695 to the last day of the same month":—

ffor Iron work for a new sledge to bring ye Organ Pipes to ye Church, wt. 1 c. 2 qrs. 12 lbs. at 4*d.* per lb. - - - -	03 : 05 : 00
ffor Carriage of Organ Pipes from Suffolk Street to ye Church with one teame, 2 days - -	01 : 04 : 00

Between the ffirst day of January 1696 to the last day of ffebruary following:—

ffor 2 days work of one Teame to fetch Organ Pipes - -	01 : 04 : 00

The following is the specification of the organ erected by "Mr. Bernard Smith, Organ Maker":—

"A curious feature of the old organ," Sir George Martin states, "as may be seen in any of the ancient prints, was a series of window sashes filled with glass; these were intended to keep out the dust and were drawn down when the organ was not in use. They could never have fulfilled their purpose, but it is remarkable how expensive they were . . . 89 panes for the incredible sum of £117 14s. But we must not forget that the glass was 'Christalle.'

"The eight statue angels on the top of the organ, about 5 feet 6 inches in height, carved in oak, cost £20 each.

The Drapery and whole Boys, and two halfe Boys £25 : 00 : 00.

These are above the central panel of pipes in the Chayre organ—where the organist sits." Grinling Gibbons received £610 18s. 2d. for the carving. "This is a large sum," says Sir George; "but," he very properly adds, "we have in Grinling Gibbons's work an inheritance that can never be replaced." A full description of the present new organ by Mr. Henry Willis is also given, to which we hope to refer at another opportunity. We must, however, find space for the "plum" of Sir George Martin's admirable account of the St. Paul's organ. He says:—

I am a real lover of the tone of "Father Smith's" pipes and fully appreciate their peculiar quality, but this admiration can be carried too far. When I first came to St. Paul's I was told that a certain stop was made by "Father Smith," and I naturally implicitly believed this. At the same time I considered that some of the new stops of the same family were equal to it. In showing the organ to many distinguished musicians during a period of sixteen years, I naturally called attention to this particular "Father Smith" stop, but always played immediately afterwards on one of the new ones to show that it was equally good. In every case the distinguished musician said the same thing, "Yes, that new stop is very beautiful, but there's a peculiar charm about the old one—do play on it again." When the organ was cleaned, I discovered that the so-called "Father Smith" stop was a new one made in 1871 by our own "Father Willis"!

The above story may be supplemented by another, which, if not quite new to all our readers, is too good not to be retold. Father Smith's old organ stood on the screen at the entrance of the Choir until the year 1860, when the screen was removed. The compass of the great organ manual was to CCC, and its lower notes were remarkably fine, especially in thunderous effects. A regular attendant at St. Paul's when in London was Miss Maria Hackett, the devoted friend of all cathedral choristers. Whenever there happened to be any reference to "storms and tempests" in the Psalms for the day, the organ would give forth a deep roll, to the great delight of Miss Hackett, who would gaze up at the instrument with a benignant smile of intense satisfaction. On one occasion, when Sydney Smith happened to be the Canon in residence, the Psalms had been unusually full of atmospheric disturbances. The organ, therefore, was exceedingly tempestuously inclined, and the dear good lady's face beamed almost incessantly. After the service the witty cleric said to the organist: "Mr. Goss: I don't know whether you have ever observed this extraordinary phenomenon: your organ never thunders but Miss Hackett's face lightens."

The Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral asks us to state that a limited number of this Report of the "Musical and other Services," above referred to, may be obtained by persons officially interested in Church music on application to him at 8, Amen Court.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, writes in reference to the article entitled "Conductors—Native or Foreign?" which appeared in our last issue (p. 723). He calls attention to the training of conductors at the Academy in the following words:—

"As a matter of fact, I very frequently have students conducting on Tuesdays and Fridays; and if anyone would take the trouble to look in at the Academy towards the end of the orchestral rehearsals on those days, the chances are that he would find a student with the stick in his hand. More especially in the earlier part of the term, before the rehearsals for the concerts become precious moments. There is a 'standing order' in our boys' room to the effect that any student wishing to conduct a piece has only to notify it to the librarian and get the score for the necessary study, and the earliest opportunity is afforded him to wield the baton.

"I think that nothing more ought to be expected from Academies or Colleges. To institute a class solely for conducting would mean an orchestra for the purpose, which is a very expensive matter. Is it all to come out of eleven guineas per term? Or is it likely that the orchestral students, who are already compelled to attend twice per week for orchestral practice and the accompaniments of the solos and songs of their fellow-students, would submit to another afternoon for the purpose of sitting there as 'blocks' for other students to practise upon? Along with their other studies, lectures, &c., where is their daily practice at home to come in? Failing this, is the Royal Academy of Music to provide a small professional orchestra (a third time during the week) for half-a-dozen students, whereas each student already costs £8 or £10 over and above that which he pays for?

"A great deal too much is asked from the Academies and Colleges. I know of no Foreign Conservatoire where such a class, at such an expense, exists. Why here? The extra fee which might be charged for such a class would not meet a quarter of the outlay. And would not be paid, as most of the students cannot afford to pay any more.

"The only method is to adopt the plan I initiated at the Academy some years ago—viz., to give the composition students, or some of the violin or orchestral students, the opportunity of conducting on Tuesdays and Fridays whenever it is possible. In fact, this is done at Tenterden Street. Men such as Granville Bantock (New Brighton Tower), Allen Gill (People's Palace), and many others who are now in posts of this kind have had these opportunities under my régime, and those who desire it have the same privilege at the present time. I have at least two young men who conduct very frequently at the Academy, and who will make very fair conductors."

It is interesting thus to know that, at least, something is being done at the Academy in the direction of training native conductors. The chiefs of our other great schools of music may perhaps follow Sir Alexander's example by also stating a case in so far as it affects their particular establishments. In the meantime, some of our readers may feel sufficiently interested in the matter to discuss the subject in our correspondence column.

A subscription has been started to assist the two daughters of the late John Liptrot Hatton—Miss M. M. Hatton and Mrs. Frances J. Moore—on account of their advancing years (they being aged fifty-seven and sixty respectively) and their inability to earn adequate means to support themselves and those dependent upon them. Mrs. Moore (whose eyesight is fast failing her) is the widow of a doctor who died very suddenly some few years ago, leaving her and five children totally unprovided for, two of whom still have to be maintained. The First Lord of the Treasury, Mr. A. J. Balfour, has promised that "should a subscription be started by the admirers of the late Mr. Hatton's compositions" with the object of providing permanently for these two ladies, he would contribute to it from the Royal Bounty Fund. Among the contributions that have already been received is one of £50 from the Goldsmiths' Company. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mr. T. Stanley Chappell, 50, New Bond Street.

Sir John and Lady Stainer have gone abroad or three months. Sir John has recently completed fifty years of professional life. He entered the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, as a chorister boy, aged seven, in 1848. He deserves a good holiday. May he greatly enjoy it.

A correspondent, who is a flautist, has asked us to supply him with biographies of four Italian composers for the flute. As the required information is not forthcoming in the usual books of reference, we have specially obtained the following information from "Our Own Correspondent" in Rome.

Ciardi, Cesare, born at Prato, near Florence, June 29, 1818, died at Strelna, June 13, 1877. He travelled much and was flautist to the Court of St. Petersburg. Wrote many works for his instrument and composed a valuable Method; he also published an Album of pieces for singing. He has written a concerto of large dimensions (Op. 129), and his "Trois solos" (Op. 124, 125, 126) are amongst his finest original works.

Demichelis, Vincent, born at Rome, 1825. He gave many concerts and was a fine composer. He invented some modifications in the construction of his instrument and compiled for it a "Method." He occupied the post of first flute in the Apollo Theatre, now demolished by the works for preventing inundation from the Tiber. Demichelis died some years since at Rome.

Hugues, Louis. I have not discovered the date of his birth—he is probably not living. He began his career at Piedmont, but I believe he remained a long time at Casale, and that he had a brother, also a professor of the flute, with whom he gave many concerts. Very little biographical information is at present available concerning him.

Krakamp, Emanuel, born at Messina (Sicily), February 13, 1813, died at Naples, 1883—son of a military bandmaster—was a prosperous concert-virtuoso. He went to America, but in 1841 returned to Naples, where he occupied some important positions at the Conservatoire. He left the country for political reasons in 1848, and gave concerts in all the chief cities of Europe, at Alexandria, and at Cairo. In 1860, after the fall of the Bourbons, he returned to Naples, where he held the post of professor of wind-instruments and solfeggi at the Conservatoire. Renowned as an executant, esteemed as a composer (more than 300 works), his "Methods" for flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon are still in use in our conservatoires.

Mr. C. L. Graves, one of the most cultured of musical critics, thus writes in the Guardian on Mendelssohn, apropos of a performance of the Overture to a "Midsummer Night's Dream," a work which he calls "ever-welcome":—

It is the fashion in certain circles to belittle Mendelssohn as representative of Early Victorian art, respectability, and shallowness, and, when other weapons of attack fail, to denounce him bluntly as a Jew. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that these tactics are likely to commend themselves to English amateurs. They are rather too suggestive of the methods of MM. Drumont and Henri Rochefort. Besides, the British public very properly dislikes being dragooned in the matter of its likes and dislikes. Musical criticism should avoid the procedure of the Etat-Major. In this attempt to extend the Judenhetze to music it is to be feared that the uncompromising adherents of Wagner have taken the lead. Yet Wagner himself admitted that—

"Mendelssohn has shown us that a Jew can have the highest specific talent, possess the most refined and varied culture, the most exalted and delicate sense of honour."

Furthermore, though he denied him the power of producing "soul-stirring impressions," he pronounced him to be "a landscape painter of the first order," declared the "Hebrides" overture to possess "extraordinary beauty, wonderful imagination, and delicate feeling . . . presented with consummate art." It is the old story of Wilkes being no Wilkesite. The growth of the anti-Mendelssohnian reaction is ably traced and explained by Rubinstein in his brochure on music and musicians. Rubinstein attributes it, in great measure, to the great esteem Mendelssohn enjoyed in his lifetime, and prophesies that the public will "certainly return to him with love and reverence," and once more take great delight in his works, foremost amongst which he places the Midsummer Night's Dream music. He, too, like Wagner, admits that Mendelssohn never moved him deeply, and explains this on the principle of man by "suffering made strong." Mendelssohn never "ate his bread with tears." He and Meyberbeer were the children of wealthy parents, and enjoyed the most refined training and education; they were, in their homes, surrounded by the most intellectually select society, and pursued art, not as a means of subsistence, but followed it for pleasure. Hence this is reflected in their music, which contains "no tears, no agonies of the soul, no bitterness, and almost no complaint."

Mr. Frederic H. Cowen was conducting a concert in Dublin the other day, and on drawing up in a car at the side door of the hall, he asked the Jehu if he would come back for him at that entrance. "Sure oi will, sor," he replied. "Then I will call out for Mr. Cowen's car." "Oi'm afraid I cannot rimimber that name, sor, onless you wroite it down on a piece of phaper." "Well, do you think you can remember the name of O'Brien?" "Sure, oi can rimimber that well enough, sor!" So, after the concert, Mr. O'Brien's car was successfully called for and produced, and the said composer and conductor goes now by the name of "O'Brien Cowen!" With a librettist of unbridled humour, and a composer who would give free rein to his fancy, those Paddy-Jarvies might form the subject of an opera entitled—"The Dublin Carmen." (Shades of Bizet!)

Wagner was not the first to complain of the inanity of the libretti of Italian operas. In 1754 Lord Chesterfield, in the World, wrote as follows: "Were what is called the poetry of it (i.e., of Italian opera) intelligible in itself, it would not be understood by one in fifty of a British audience; but I believe that even an Italian of common candour will confess that he does not understand one word of it. It is not the intention of the thing; for should the ingenious author of the words, by mistake, put any meaning into them, he would, to a certain degree, check and cramp the genius of the composer of the music, who perhaps might think himself obliged to adapt his sounds to the sense; whereas now he is at liberty to scatter indiscriminately, among the kings, queens, heroes, and heroines, his adagios, his allegros, his pathetics, his chromatics, and his jiggs."

Mascagni's new opera, "Iris," was produced at the Costanzi Theatre, at Rome, on the evening of the 22nd ult., in the presence of Queen Margherita, the Prince and Princess of Naples, and the Duke of Aosta. The opera and its composer were received with tremendous enthusiasm, and at the close of the performance the audience were wild with excitement. The opera is on a Japanese subject and is essentially melodious. The work is announced to be given in London during the winter.

Mr. C. Lee Williams has just returned from Canada, where he has been holding examinations at Montreal, Toronto, and Kingston on behalf of the Associated Board.

Mr. John Francis Barnett has written a new Suite for the pianoforte, which Miss Emma Barnett will introduce at her pianoforte recital during the present month.

Mr. Edward Lloyd will form the subject of the Biographical Sketch in our next number. The successful career of our greatest tenor, and his views on certain matters connected with the art from a distinguished vocalist's point of view, are sure to be of great interest.

CHURCH MUSIC.

There is some reason in the complaint that one difficulty in the way of reviving old Church music lies in the treatment of the voice parts, more especially as regards compass. This remark applies chiefly to the alto part, the range covered by the old counter tenor and alto parts not being suitable, the majority of modern Church choirs lacking the required voices and frequently employing boys' voices, and so converting, as far as may be, the alto into a contralto part. Then, on the other hand, the oratorio music by modern composers, now so frequently sung in our churches, presents a part with a compass combining almost the notes of both contralto and second soprano voices. The assistance of choral societies with mixed voices may be said to have removed the last named difficulty to a large extent. As regards the employment of old Church music, one might be almost bold enough to ask, Why should not some recognised Cathedral musicians be invited to make a few changes in the old alto parts, where possible, without doing violence to contrapuntal progressions, in view of the exigencies of modern Church choirs? Again, the example of the printed transposition of Gibbons in F into the key of G might be extended with advantage.

A musical service was held at Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, under the direction of the organist, Mr. J. Curry, on the 13th ult. Two of the anthems were Stainer's picturesque and impressive "What are these which are arrayed in white robes?" and Marcello's 8th Psalm, with its old-fashioned grace and simple earnestness. The Dedication services at All Saints', Llanelly, from the 1st to the 8th ult., were marked by an excellent selection of well-known anthems and an organ recital given by Mr. A. W. Swindell.

At the recent consecration of St. Mary's Cathedral, Auckland, New Zealand, a new anthem from the pen of Mr. Leslie Hunt was sung, a setting of words from the Psalm "O how amiable are Thy dwellings." The work is reported to be one of interest and good musicianship. It is written for tenor solo and chorus, and closes with a brief and, according to report, effective fugal movement.

The annual service of the London Church Choir Association in St. Paul's Cathedral and the opening of the new organ at Lincoln Cathedral are noticed elsewhere.

ORGAN MUSIC.

The new organ, built by Messrs. Hill and Son for the Northern Polytechnic Institute, Holloway, is an admirable specimen of the builders' best manner. The instrument was opened, on the 2nd ult., by Sir Frederick Bridge. It will ultimately possess four manuals and pedals, with thirty-six sounding stops, and some sixteen couplers and other mechanical movements. This excellent instrument adds one more to the available recital organs of the metropolis.

Under the management and by the artistic enterprise of Dr. J. Warriner, a series of twelve recitals are being given at the Royal College of Organists, a charming performance by Sir Walter Parratt leading the way. This has been followed by recitals given by Mr. E. H. Lemare, Dr. E. H. Turpin, and Mr. W. S. Hoyte. Other performers, all well known in the organ-playing world, are announced to follow. These include Dr. H. W. Davies, Mr. F. R. Frye, Mr. Gostelow, Miss Erdroff, Mr. H. L. Balfour, Dr. H. Botting, Dr. Harding, and Dr. Abernethy.

Dr. Hiles's Sonata in G minor, one of the composer's admirable organ works, which secured prizes upon three occasions in the early days of the Royal College of Organists when competitions were the rule, was played at a recent organ recital given by Mr. Keighley at Ashton-under-Lyne. Mr. E. H. Thorne has been giving, at St. Anne's Church, Soho, a series of three Bach recitals. His programmes have included some of the too much neglected Choral Preludes, the stately yet fascinating "Passacaglia," and the Prelude and Fugue in D. The last-named work, together with several of the player's own compositions and other pieces, formed the programme of a recital given recently at Falkirk by Mr. Wolstenholme.

Mr. E. H. Lemare has successfully continued his Saturday recitals, on the fine Walker organ, over which he so ably presides, at St. Margaret's, Westminster. Mr. Lemare's performances have been so attractive as to fill the church to overflowing week by week with interested listeners.

An admirable series of Saturday recitals has been given and is being continued at Holy Trinity Church, Sloane Street, where there is an exceptionally fine instrument by Messrs J. W. Walker and Sons. The performer, Mr. Walter Alcock, who is organist of the church and assistant-organist of Westminster Abbey, is an accomplished executant.

At Romsey Abbey, a glorious old church of cathedral-like dimensions and grandeur, the organist, Mr. W. C. Bliss, gave a recital, on All Saints' Day, with the addition of an orchestra. One feature was Guilmant's remarkably fine Symphony in D minor for orchestra and organ, another being Edward Elgar's "Imperial March." Mr. Ernest H. Smith gave a Mendelssohn Recital at St. Bede's Church, Liverpool, on the 6th ult., the music including the charming Andante and Variations in D, recently published, and the Sonata in A major. A recent programme played at Grimsby by Mr. A. J. Lancashire included Widor's Fourth Organ Symphony and Grison's "Marche Triomphale."

On the 12th ult., in the Exhibition Building, York, Mr. D. Sample gave a recital of real interest to lovers of the art. He wisely elected to educate as well as please, his scheme including a Prelude and Fugue in C (J. S. Bach), Minuet and Trio (Calkin), and Grand Chœur (Salomé). Mr. A. Manglesdorff's programme at St. Mary's Church, Atherstone, on the 15th ult., included Andantino (Lemare) and Fugue in D (Bach). A recital was given at the Parish Church, High Wycombe, on the 10th ult., by Mr. G. F. Andrews, the music including Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor and Mendelssohn's Sixth Sonata. Mr. Volanti Armitage recently gave recitals at the Alexandra Palace, selecting for performance pieces by Mendelssohn, Wély, Lemare, Hollins, and other composers. Dr. M. J. Monk gave a recital in Truro Cathedral recently, his pieces including Fantasia (C. E. Miller) and Allegro con fuoco (Saint-Saëns). At the opening of a new large organ, built by Messrs. Cousans and Co., Lincoln, for the Wesleyan Chapel, Redcliffe Bridge, Mr. W. Mullineux, one of the recitalists, played, among other good things, Guilmant's Sonata (No. 4) in D minor.

The programmes of Mr. J. M. Preston's recitals at St. George's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, during the past month, included, among other interesting works, Prélude Gothique, by the rising Italian composer, Oreste Ravanello; Dr. Swinnerton Heap's Studies in A minor and E major, Dr. Hiles's Sonata in G minor, Guilmant's Sixth Sonata, Scherzo (W. S. Hoyte), and an Allegretto grazioso (H. W. Wareing).

LINCOLN CATHEDRAL: ITS NEW ORGAN.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

ST. HUGH'S DAY, 1898, has undoubtedly left its mark upon the musical history of Lincoln Cathedral. "St. Hugh," we are told, "was one of the most popular of English Saints, and November the 17th (the Accession Day of Queen Elizabeth) was appointed as the day of his commemoration." Hugh—born at Avalon in 1135, died in London, November 16, 1200—was the famous Bishop of Lincoln, to whose foresight we owe nearly the whole of the present noble fane—and how exquisitely beautiful it is—that so proudly stands on the top of the hill in the city of Lincoln. As the old organ (built in 1826) in the Cathedral was absolutely unworthy of its surroundings, thirteen years ago, during the organistship of the late Mr. J. M. W. Young, the idea of a new instrument was mooted. But it was not until 1896 that the scheme took definite shape, when Mr. Alfred Shuttleworth, Lincoln's most generous benefactor, munificently subscribed the sum of £1,000 towards the fund for a new organ. Other subscriptions received brought up the total to about £4,000 from all classes of the community—rich and poor alike, including many Nonconformists, some of whom contributed very substantial sums, and also the Cathedral choristers. It is, however, an open secret that the proposal of a new organ would probably have fallen through had it not been for the influence and unwearying energy of Canon H. W. Hutton, one of the priest-vicars, and a Prebendary of the Cathedral, who not only initiated the scheme, but became the secretary and treasurer of the organ fund. Moreover, Canon Hutton takes a prominent part in musical matters in Lincoln, being chairman of the Musical Society and one of the honorary secretaries of the Triennial Musical Festival. Here then is a gratifying instance of the beneficent influence a clergyman may exercise who has a love for the divine art of music. Canon Hutton, "organically" speaking, is a second "St. Hugh"!

THE ORGAN.

What more natural than that the authorities should entrust the building of the new instrument to "Father" Willis, who has now erected no less than seventeen Cathedral organs in England and Scotland. Mr. Willis accordingly drew up a specification of a four-manual instrument of which the following are the outlines:—

Stops.	Pipes.	Stops.	Pipes.
2 32-ft.	60	14 Great	928
11 16-ft.	480	15 Swell	974
28 8 ft.	1,498	10 Choir	580
11 4-ft.	610	8 Solo	452
6 various	580	11 Pedal	294
58 speaking stops.	3,228	58 speaking stops.	3,228
18 couplers, &c.		18 couplers, &c.
76 draw stops.		76 draw stops.

The old case, erected in 1826 at a cost of £1,508, is retained, but it has been raised 3 ft. 6 in., and stands, as heretofore, on the screen. The case, however, contains only the great, choir, solo, and a portion of the pedal organ. The swell, the heavier work of the pedal organ, and the whole of the bellows work are placed in the Triforium! The swell-box is in the first arch of the Triforium nearest the organ case on the right of the Cathedral looking West. Some of the pedal pipes—the huge thirty-twos are placed in a horizontal position—are, therefore, at a distance of 100 feet from the pedal board. The result is a perfect triumph of Mr. Willis's wonderful engineering skill. If, now and then, the slightest delay in the speech of the pipes could just be detected in some parts of the building, it was due to acoustic peculiarities and not to any mechanical shortcomings. Everything has been done to study the comfort of the organist at the keyboard—a point too often neglected by organ builders. The couplers and accessory stops (17), pistons (30), composition pedals, &c. (12), are on a lavish scale, and furnish the performer with the means for an endless variety of combinations and effects. The action is, of course, tubular pneumatic throughout, and works with wonderful promptitude. The tone of the organ is eminently satisfactory. The reeds are beautifully smooth, the flutes distinctly liquid, the soft stops lovely, and, although the tubas are on a 20-in. wind pressure, they are by no means strident. The manual and pedal couplers and tremulant stop-knobs are stained red to distinguish them from the speaking stops—a very good idea. The organ will be blown by three electric motors (at a cost of £400) as soon as they can be connected with the city mains. The organ, when completed with the pedal reed (£250), will cost altogether £4,675, exclusive of the case, which originally cost £1,508—the grand total for an organ of such grandeur in one of our grandest Cathedrals is, therefore, £6,183. It was very interesting to watch the face of the venerable "Father" Willis as he intently listened to the strains poured forth from an instrument of which he may justly feel proud.

THE DEDICATION SERVICE.

Lincoln is fortunate in having a Cathedral organist of such marked ability and skilled musicianship as Dr. G. J. Bennett, who has now held the post for three years. He is an old student of the Royal Academy of Music, and subsequently studied under Kiel and Rheinberger. Dr. Bennett had arranged a very interesting order of service for the organ "opening" on the 17th ult. It consisted of Festal Evensong, sung by an augmented choir of 168 voices, which included eighty boys. The singers were the Cathedral choirs of Ely, Peterborough, and Southwell, the boys from St. Peter's, Eaton Square (Dr. Huntley, the organist, himself singing in the choir), and of St. John the Evangelist, Wilton Road, London (where Dr. Bennett was formerly organist), some gentlemen of the Lincoln Musical Society, a small contingent of two voices from Windsor, and, of course, the Lincoln Cathedral choir, the four senior boys being clad in their traditional garb of cassocks and white stoles.

The service began with the processional hymn, "Hark! hark! the organ loudly peals," sung to a melodious and stately tune by Dr. Bennett. The special Psalms (cxxii. and cl.) were sung to a chant by Matthews—happily chosen on account of its being the one that is always sung to that Psalm at the admission service of chorister boys at the Cathedral—and a harmonized Gregorian chant. The service was Dr. Bennett's fine setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A, originally composed for the dedication festival at St. Paul's Cathedral, 1890, but revised for this occasion. The anthems were both specimens of the German school—Brahms's expressively beautiful setting of "How lovely is Thy dwelling place" and the motet for double chorus, "Blessing, glory, and wisdom and thanks," attributed to J. S. Bach, but, according to Spitta, with doubtful authority. I venture to think that one of these pieces, excellent though they be, should, on such an occasion, have given place to a composition by Purcell, or another of the great composers of the English Cathedral anthem—that glorious heritage so peculiarly our own, which it should be our privilege to cherish.

The rendering of the music at this service calls for the highest praise. However well individual choirs and individuals forming choirs may sing, it does not follow that when several such singers and choirs are amalgamated the result will be quite satisfactory without many opportunities of united rehearsal. But to the credit of Dr. Bennett, be it said, he succeeded in the short time at his disposal in bringing his combined forces well into touch with each other, with the result that there was a manifest esprit de corps and most gratifying unity of marked excellence throughout. The boys' voices were particularly fine, and so was the general attack; and there was an admirable tout ensemble about the whole service that merits hearty congratulation. Dr. Bennett conducted with firmness, tact, and discretion; under the circumstances, he might very easily have become unnerved, but he kept himself, as well as his forces, commendably under control. The organ accompaniments were in the safe keeping of so experienced and competent a Cathedral organist as Dr. Haydn Keeton, of Peterborough. Dean Lefroy, of Norwich, preached the sermon. The Cathedral was literally packed with a congregation such as has been rarely gathered within its walls. I must add that the service book was admirably compiled, and contained a very exhaustive description of the new organ from the pen of Dr. Bennett.

SIR WALTER PARRATT'S FIRST RECITAL.

Sir Walter Parratt holds such a distinguished position amongst English organists that no better choice could have been made than for the organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and Master of the Music to the Queen, to give two recitals on this auspicious occasion. The first of these took place immediately after Sir John Stainer's Sevenfold Amen had been most devotionally sung at the afternoon service. Here is the programme of Sir Walter's first and shorter recital:—

1. Concerto in G minor .. .. Handel.
   (a) Allegro e staccato.
   (b) Variations on a Ground Bass.
   (c) Minuet.
   (d) Gavotte.
2. Prelude and Fugue in C major .. .. .. J. S. Bach.
3. Lamentation .. .. Guilmant.
4. Imperial March .. .. Elgar.

It is hardly necessary to give a detailed criticism of the scheme and its worthy interpretation. A special feature was Sir Walter's registration of the Bach Prelude, which he played on the soft stops. At the end of the Fugue—how gloriously the stately subject sounded at its last entry in the pedal—a splendidly wrought climax was intensified by the use of the tubas, which resounded along the nave with magnificent effect. Guilmant's "Lamentation" afforded a good opportunity for displaying the refined quality of a delicately voiced reed on the swell, and Mr. Elgar's majestic Imperial March concluded a memorable service.

SIR WALTER PARRATT'S EVENING RECITAL.

The organ keyboards at Lincoln are on the North side of the case, therefore the organist has a view extending the whole length of the building, East and West. Long before the hour for the commencement of the recital the nave was occupied by an eagerly expectant audience, whose anticipations were destined to be more than realised. Immediately after the last stroke of eight had died away, Sir Walter plunged into Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor as one eager for the fray. But I had better give the programme in extenso:—

1. Toccata and Fugue in D minor .. .. .. J. S. Bach.
2. Fantasia in F minor .. .. Mozart.
   (c) Andante. (d) Double Fugue.
3. Sonata in D major (No. 5) .. .. .. Mendelssohn.
4. Marche Funèbre .. .. Tschaikowsky.
5. (a) Allegro Cantabile, (b) Toccata .. .. Widor.
6. (a) Cantabile, (b) Ite Missa est .. .. Lemmens.

There is no greater student of Bach in this country than Sir Walter Parratt. He has a reverence for the great Leipzig Cantor not possessed by all players upon the "King of instruments," and no fault could be found either with his execution or registration of this great classic of the organ. The Mozart piece was a remarkable exhibition of technical skill. It was quite evident that Sir Walter was not only in splendid form, but that he thoroughly enjoyed playing this masterpiece. Mendelssohn's D major Sonata (No. 5) followed, and then the congregation, without any preliminary announcement, except the playing over of the tune, rose and sang the hymn "The Church's one foundation," to S. S. Wesley's fine tune "Aurelia," during which the collection was taken. As the congregation, without the lead of a choir, warmed up to their work, a fine volume of sound rolled towards the organ loft, and Sir Walter Parratt had little difficulty in keeping the huge congregation up to time. Though so simple, this song of the people was by no means the least interesting feature of an eventful day.

After the hymn, Tschaïkowsky's "Marche Funèbre" was played with appropriate feeling, the surroundings being in complete accord with the deep impressiveness of the music. Widor's popular "Allegro Cantabile" and "Toccata," from his Fourth Organ Symphony, proved to be most attractive, and characteristically demonstrated that rhythmical precision and neat phrasing which, with an extraordinary command of the pedal board, are such marked features of Sir Walter Parratt's playing. The "Toccata" was taken at a very rapid pace, but every note was clearly played; it was a most brilliant performance. The two pieces by Lemmens concluded a scheme that was no less admirable in its selection than remarkable for the way it was executed in every detail. Thus this red-letter day in the history of the fine old Minster was brought to a fitting conclusion. The collections at the service and evening recital amounted to about £180.

Since the opening ceremony two gentlemen of the city, as showing their appreciation of the new organ, have generously offered to defray the cost of the 32-ft. pedal reed (£250): thus the organ will not only be complete, but paid for.

In conclusion, the Dean and Chapter, and especially Canon H. W. Hutton, Dr. G. J. Bennett—who gave two excellent recitals on the Sunday following St. Hugh's Day—and Mr. Henry Willis, are all to be congratulated upon the magnificent instrument that now forms a worthy adjunct to the manifold beauties of Lincoln Cathedral.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

With an excellent performance of "Elijah" at the Albert Hall, on the 10th ult., this popular Society commenced its twenty-eighth season, under the most promising conditions. That Mendelssohn's noble work is as great a favourite as ever with the subscribers was proved both by the large attendance and the interest taken in the happily long familiar solos and choruses. This appreciation was evidently shared by the principals, the chorus, and the orchestra. In no department was there indication of indifference, carelessness, or hesitation, so that the watchful Sir Frederick Bridge's task of securing a worthy interpretation was by no means difficult. The choir, never better qualified to do justice to the Baal passages, the "Thanks be to God," and other well-known numbers falling to its share, responded to the conductor's wishes with absolute accuracy. Expression was observed throughout, and abundant power was evident whenever required. Madame Ella Russell sang the soprano solos with the utmost spirit and feeling, and Miss Giulia Ravogli gave particular effect to Jezebel's denunciations. Mr. Edward Lloyd delivered the tenor airs with unabated charm of voice and style, and Mr. Santley—still unrivalled as the Prophet—sang "Is not His word?" with an impulse that moved the listeners to enthusiasm. In the double quartet Miss Maggie Purvis, Miss Edith Leslie, Mr. William Fell, and Mr. Harry Dearth rendered efficient service.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

These most excellent concerts were resumed on October 29, when Mr. Newman's hobby-horse, "Symphonie Pathetique," was once more ridden to the admiration of a crowded house. Moral for all orchestral conductors everywhere: Play the "Pathetic" for the remainder of your days and you will please the dear public evermore. We do not know how the work fared on this occasion, for we purposely absented ourselves pro tem. We cannot endure this nerve-shattering music any more, and shall give it a well deserved rest till further notice. A quasi-novelty was Mr. Edward German's fine Symphonic Poem "Hamlet," produced at last year's Birmingham Festival. Mr. Henry J. Wood is hardly ever happy with English music, and this was no exception to the rule. His performance was unimpressive and very different from that secured by Dr. Richter at Birmingham. The mysterious opening was mysterious only in that there was a strange absence of clearness in the movement of the parts. The polyphony sounded exceedingly muddy, if we may use such an expression, and there was not even a faint suggestion of atmosphere or tragic import. The tempi in the Allegro were open to objection, especially that of the music dealing with Ophelia. In one word, a disappointing rendering. When will Mr. Wood remember that he is an Englishman and should take a pride in doing his utmost for his countrymen whenever he gets the very rare chance of performing one of their compositions? He takes enormous pains over novelties of the Russian school; his performance of these could not be surpassed for finish, brilliancy, and insight. When will he do the same for British works? An absolute novelty, splendidly played, was a selection (Nocturne and Festival music) from Carl Goldmark's opera "The Queen of Sheba"—pretentious music, brilliantly scored, which would appeal to us if the subject-matter were more original and impressive. High-class Kapellmeister Musik! Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture opened the programme and received a distinctly uninspired interpretation. The opening chords were hardly sustained beyond the metronomic duration of the bars; the pauses over them were ignored, as if the orchestra had been in a hurry. The famous semiquaver fiddle passage was not once played with absolute exactitude; for all in the world, in fact, as if Mendelssohn were an English composer! Two of Brahms's best known Hungarian Dances, scored, and rather coarsely scored, by A. Parlow, went with all possible dash, and the "Oberon" Overture (in which, by the way, some German conductors now play the opening phrase on the muted horn) completed the orchestral selection. A great, and, we may add, legitimate success was made by Miss Lilian Blauvelt, an American high soprano gifted with a voice of lovely quality, which she uses with absolute ease and certainty of intonation and with the delightfully artless art denoting the born singer. She was equally at home in the florid Mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," a simple German song by Mendelssohn, and Délibes's arch "Filles de Cadiz."

At the next concert, on the 12th ult., the orchestra was at its best. No finer playing could be desired than that of the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet "Mlada." This is very Russian music, of little account as regards subject-matter or its development, but orchestrated with most extraordinary brilliancy, especially in the final "Cortège," in which the piccolo trumpet part (played on this occasion on a "Bach" trumpet), in combination with a large complement of other brass, produces a remarkable effect. Rimsky-Korsakoff is certainly the master of all orchestral colourists. He is forever devising new effects and fresh instrumental combinations of rare euphony and surpassing charm. Everything is calculated with absolute certainty of the intended effect, and he has this advantage over his greater countryman, Tschaïkowsky, that he never repeats a new effect ad nauseam in his delight at having created it. But for the rest, what can be said in favour of this music, so barren in melodic interest and artistic workmanship? It leaves us utterly unmoved, and all too soon we grow weary of the gorgeous apparel in which its pretty, harmless little ideas are dressed. There are those, no doubt, who admire such music. Well, "Es muss auch solche Käuze geben," as Faust says to Margaret. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony—and more especially its matchless Adagio—was doubly welcome after the Russian composer's effusion. A Beethoven Adagio! The term is synonymous with one of the highest achievements of the human mind. When will the Russian masters begin to realize the significance of that achievement and devote their undoubted gifts to the creation of slow movements which, like the Ever Womanly, shall "draw us onward"? Who will give us the first Russian Adagio that shall not, like the Finale to the "Pathetic," tear our nerves to tatters; but soothe our troubled spirits, console us, strengthen us, and "bring all Heav'n before our eyes"? When the Russians begin to write such movements they will be entitled to wear the mantles of the great classics whose claims to greatness rest chiefly on their divine slow movements. The Symphony was beautifully played and Mr. Wood has every reason to be proud of such an achievement. Nicodé's Symphonic Variations in C minor (Op. 27) have been heard before at a promenade concert. They are of considerable interest, containing, as they do, much impressive, highly artistic, and effective music. Without being great, they are not unworthy of comparison with other orchestral variations by great masters. Dvorák's over-lengthy and in places brutally noisy Overture "Husitska" (Op. 67) does not appeal to us. Its rampant Slavism deserves respect, no doubt; but it is not beautiful music. Miss Blauvelt sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" and Mozart's "Voi, che sapete," quite delightfully.

MR. NEWMAN'S WAGNER CONCERTS.

We should prefer to call the above Beethoven-Wagner concerts, for we hope that the former master's symphonies, one of which is included in each of the programmes, are as powerful an attraction to the public as the selections from his successor's music-dramas. As it happened, even the combination of these two great names did not succeed in filling Queen's Hall. The cheaper seats were crowded, but there were ghastly rows of empty stalls at the three concerts that had taken place when we went to press with our present issue. There is no need to waste a word on the Wagner selections, except to state that they were played with consummate mastery over their technical and interpretative difficulties, and roused the audiences, as usual, to expressions of the warmest enthusiasm. The Symphonies were, on the 7th ult., the "Eroica," on the 14th, the "Choral," and on the 21st, the No. 7. At the first concert Mr. Philip Brozel sang the "Schmiedelieder," from "Siegfried," with some success, and at the third Miss Blauvelt increased the most favourable impression previously made, by her beautiful singing of "Elsa's Dream" ("Lohengrin") and "Elizabeth's Greeting" ("Tannhäuser"). The latter especially was a splendid performance, full of vocal charm and that womanly enthusiasm which this beautiful air so imperatively demands. A word of warm appreciation is due to Mr. Wood for the dignified and impressive performance of the "Choral" Symphony, the stupendous Finale especially. The choir sang with spirit and effect, and the formidable difficulties of its task were surmounted with assurance and success, while the soloists, Misses Fillunger and McDougall, Messrs. Lloyd Chandos and Daniel Price, were more than equal to the exceptional occasion.

Mr. Wood adopted Wagner's suggestion as regards the scoring, by letting the horns play with the wood-wind in the famous second subject of the Scherzo and giving to the trumpets the whole of the opening fanfare in the Finale, instead of merely the A's and D's. The effect was correspondingly much greater, and, accepting the responsibility of a mere personal opinion, we confess to complete approval of Mr. Wood's course. Nothing seems more ridiculous to us, or more in direct contravention of what must have been Beethoven's intention, than to hear some sixty stringed instruments suddenly drop to a pp (after they have given forth a truly magnificent body of tone in all loud passages during the rest of the evening) at the very point where Beethoven particularly wishes them to hammer out his figure of accompaniment with all their weight, ff in four octaves! If the strings played all ff's throughout the evening as pp's, the ludicrous anti-climax would not be apparent; but the ordinary performance of the passage "as Beethoven wrote it" seems to us an absurd sacrifice of the Beethoven spirit on the altar of the poor printed letter! When will our purists remember that Beethoven never wrote for sixty-four strings and never dreamt of his wood-wind (one each flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon) playing that pretty tune against sixty-four strings, and English strings into the bargain? If he could hear Mr. Wood's orchestra, would he not shout with delight at the superb quality of the strings? but would he not proceed forthwith to re-score that passage, especially if he compared the refined tone of our oboes and clarinets with the coarse, penetrating quality of the instruments for which he wrote? But why not let the trumpets join in the theme too, Mr. Wood? You may as well be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb. Then only will you be able to let the strings play a real ff, and then only shall we have Beethoven in his most "unbuttoned" mood! Either reduce the strings or let them play pp throughout the concert, or adopt Wagner's suggestions as regards this passage in toto. Any compromise appears to us ludicrous and a misrepresentation of the great master. We look forward with pleasure to indignant protests from all sorts and conditions of Beethoven lovers, but they will never cause us to change our rebellious mind.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

An important English novelty was produced under Mr. Manns's direction at the concert of October 29. What would budding English composers do without Mr. Manns, and how can they repay the great debt they owe him? It was Mr. Marshall Hall's turn this time to feel thankful to the veteran German conductor for giving a hearing to an elaborate and ambitious work from his pen. Mr. Hall is the composer of a concert-overture produced (also at the Palace) in 1893. The present work challenges the application of a high standard of criticism, and we do not hesitate to say that this "Idyl" for full (very full) orchestra merits more attention than it seems to have received. It is, as we have said, an elaborate piece, brimful of ideas of varying degrees of importance and beauty. Ultra modern in style and gorgeously scored, it proved rather bewildering on a first hearing; but it gave us the impression of deserving an effort to understand its hidden meaning and appreciate the greater beauties that seem to lie below the surface. It created the desire for a closer acquaintance, and that is generally a good sign. Its reception was by no means enthusiastic, but, notwithstanding, we hope we shall have another opportunity of hearing so clever a work. The Symphony was Dvorák's "From the New World," a great favourite here as elsewhere. It was well played, as was also Richard Strauss's brilliant but fearfully difficult "Till Eulenspiegel," a jeu d'esprit for which we feel unbounded admiration. Only a genius could have written it! Mr. J. Hollman played a Fantaisie for violoncello by Massenet, an ably scored and fairly interesting piece, as well as two trifles from his own pen; while Mr. Edward Lloyd enchanted his hearers by his superb singing of the "Preislied" ("Meistersinger") and the serenade "When the orb of day," from "Euryanthe." He also introduced an air from Bach's cantata for Easter, "I know that my Redeemer lives," with accompaniments scored from the figured bass by Mr. C. A. Barry.

At the following concert, on the 5th ult., Raff's "Lenore" Symphony, once a great favourite, was revived. Time was when Raff was thought a marvel at orchestration. Tschäikowsky and his Russian colleagues have altered all that, and Raff's effects sound already old-fashioned and ineffective. Thus are our ears spoilt for mere colour in a few years! Fortunately there are masters whose music is great apart from all "colour." Who ever troubles to comment on Beethoven's scoring? Raff is not a Beethoven, but his music possesses qualities that make it interesting and enjoyable, and this symphony is one of his best. The performance of Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in A minor, for the first time in London, was an interesting event. The composer conducted, but the orchestra, very different from the Gloucester Festival Band, did not seem to realize the qualities of originality and power in this striking work of the young Anglo-African. They played rather listlessly, and the young composer, who again conducted his piece, was consequently unable to draw the full measure of glowing passion out of the pathetic pleading second subject, nor the whole of the rugged force out of the opening and closing sections. His success was nevertheless almost as emphatic as at Gloucester. Mr. Otto Hegner played Beethoven's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto and some smaller pieces by Chopin and Schubert-Tausig with charm and refinement, but little else can be said in his favour. Miss Isabel McDougall sang Liszt's beautiful setting of Goethe's "Kennst du das Land" and an air by Gluck artistically and impressively, and Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava" closed the programme.

The last concert of the present short season, on the 12th ult., included Schumann's beautiful and romantic "Nachtlied" (poem by Hebbel, ably translated by Miss G. E. Troutbeck) for chorus and orchestra. It is one of the great master's shortest choral works, but the music is so full of mystic charm and poetic feeling, and the passage "Fathomless, limitless being, giant-like power," is so remarkable for nobility and strength, that the work should become a favourite with choral societies. The orchestration is, moreover, remarkably rich for Schumann. Schubert's great Symphony (which is now variously numbered 7, 9, and 10!) and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture were the purely orchestral pieces, and, needless to say, were splendidly performed. M. Jean Gérardy played in masterly style the solo in Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto in A, as well as in a new set of Symphonic Variations for violoncello and orchestra (Op. 23) by the lately deceased young and promising French composer Boëllmann. They form not only a brilliant means of display for the soloist, but are musically of great interest and frequently of distinct beauty. They possess the inestimable advantage of being founded on a very charming theme, besides being scored with easy mastery. Miss Clara Butt sang.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The Monday Popular Concerts are no longer with us. According to Mr. Arthur Chappell we have not duly appreciated them, so, treating us like naughty children, he has taken them away until the "Spring comes slowly up"; but he has left us consolation on Saturday afternoons, and began his forty-first series on October 29.

The performances do not call for detailed criticism, for they have chiefly consisted of familiar works, which have been interpreted in a manner equally well-known to those who take an interest in these concerts. Down to the 19th ult. the quartet party has been led by Lady Hallé, except on the 12th ult., when her place was taken by M. Gorski, and the other string players have been Messrs. Haydn Inwards, Gibson, and Paul Ludwig. The quartets which have severally headed the first four programmes were Beethoven's in E flat (Op. 74), Schubert's in A minor (Op. 29), Schumann's in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1), and Haydn's in D (Op. 50, No. 6). The last-named is a singularly interesting example of the old master, "its Allegro being one of the few examples of a piece in 'first movement' form having for its second subject not an independent theme, but one derived from the first," and its slow movement being one of exceptional beauty and remarkably modern in character.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann was engaged as solo pianist at the first two concerts, his most important performances on these occasions being respectively Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35) and Weber's Sonata in A flat (Op. 39). These and a number of smaller pieces were interpreted with his usual exquisite beauty of tone and subtlety of expression, but his reading of Weber's Sonata was marred by alterations of the text and narrow phrasing. Mdlle. Ella Pancera appeared at the third concert and was heard in Schubert's Fantasia in C (Op. 15), and, associated with Mr. Paul Ludwig, in M. Saint-Saëns's Sonata in C minor (Op. 32) for pianoforte and violoncello. She created a favourable impression in both works. On the 19th ult. Miss Katie Goodson was the pianist, but made the mistake of selecting for her principal solo Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), which is beyond her present abilities. Young people should leave something for full-blown virtuosi.

The vocalists in the order of the concerts have been Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Miss Isabel McDougall, and Miss Louise Dale, concerning whose singing it is unnecessary to comment.

Mr. S. Liddle was the accompanist at the opening concert, but after that Mr. Henry Bird occupied this important position with his usual skill.

KARL KLINDWORTH AT FREDERICK DAWSON'S CONCERT.

Professor Klindworth's fame does not rest on his achievements as a wielder of the baton; he is not one of the band of travelling "star" conductors which Germany is producing in almost embarrassing numbers. Yet after his great success at Mr. Dawson's concert, on the 22nd ult., we fancy that even in his advanced years, but with body and mind more active than those of most men half his age, he may safely rely upon appealing to large and enthusiastic audiences whenever he chooses to act as interpreter of the great masters' genius as revealed in their orchestral works. It needed but the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" to demonstrate in the plainest manner that the distinguished professor is no ordinary conductor, that he has lived in Beethoven's creation, so to speak, has made the life that palpitates therein part and parcel of his life, and has learned to reproduce it on that most perfect of instruments, the Beethoven orchestra.

Professor Klindworth's reading of the whole symphony was conceived in the noblest spirit. Dignity and pathos, breadth of conception and depth of feeling were apparent throughout. Moreover, it was an eminently vocal performance. Every melodic phrase was "sung" by the orchestra, as Wagner insisted it should be "sung." This it was no doubt that made the rendering so pathetically human. Human life, man's aspirations and suffering, but also man's joie de vivre amidst the suffering, throbbed in every bar. With a slight broadening of his beat, all but imperceptible, the conductor would emphasize the melodic beauty of a phrase, insist on its emotional significance, and touch us to the quick with those almost too familiar successions of notes which yet, at the touch of genius, flash forth in their full effulgence, Heaven-sent inspirations!

Nothing was more poetic in the opening Allegro than the conductor's management of the famous "false entry" of the horn. He held the strings back as in breathless expectancy; movement and life almost ceased for very wonderment; anon the horn entered tentatively, softly, slowly, while all the voices of the orchestra seemed "hushed in solemn silence," and the throbbing of the violins grew slower and fainter. Then a crash—and light and exuberant life had returned. The Funeral March presented many points of interest upon which we cannot stop to dwell. The Scherzo was played very fast, but with wonderful clearness and elasticity, and the horns in the Trio were as human as only horns, of all orchestral instruments, can be. But the finest part of the performance was the most brilliant account which Professor Klindworth gave of the Finale, that Finale which, even now, is undervalued by many who profess a full appreciation of Beethoven's genius. Here was the conductor who had no misgivings as to whether this magnificent movement forms a worthy and appropriate climax to what has gone before. He threw his whole heart and his whole art into a great interpretation of great music. The fire and impetuosity, the roughness and exuberance, the exquisite pathos and grandeur, as they in turn reveal themselves in this movement, were reproduced with wonderful insight and effect. Rarely have we had so exhilarating an experience as this splendid performance.

The remainder of the programme was devoted to works by the three great "moderns," Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner, whose champion Professor Klindworth has ever been. Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony and Liszt's A major Pianoforte Concerto may not be works over which we can all wax enthusiastic. As to the Concerto, it seems still almost as bewildering and rhapsodical as when we first heard it. But the superb performance given by Mr. Dawson as soloist and the orchestra under Professor Klindworth went a long way towards increasing our respect for the work. Our young countryman has made tremendous strides onward since we last heard him, and by his very brilliant, powerful, as well as poetic performance of this difficult work he placed himself in the front rank of living pianists. He was recalled four times, but wisely declined to play again. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture concluded a most enjoyable concert.

ERNST VON DOHNÁNYI'S QUINTET.

Another coming man amongst composers? We confess that young Von Dohnányi amazed us the while we were listening to a superb performance of his MS. Pianoforte Quintet at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 16th ult. This was our first introduction to the gifted Hungarian pianist as a composer. True, we had heard his effective and masterly cadenzas to Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte Concerto at the Richter concert, but they could hardly be looked upon as independent "compositions." Having listened with rapt attention to this youthful quintet (it was written three years ago), it seems as if we must say straightway: Here is another young man in whom the fire of genius burns, one who, while still a youth, writes as one who has a message to deliver to the world and has learnt how to say it boldly and in a beautiful language. We were both astonished and delighted while the composer-pianist, assisted by Messrs. Péskai, Verbrugghen, Férir, and Lebell, unfolded his four movements to us; for his music flows with an utter absence of effort—a broad stream of melody, and from a seemingly inexhaustible and original fount of that most rare commodity. And his melody is lacking neither in distinction nor charm. His themes breathe now a dignified pathos, now a fervent passion, as in the opening Allegro and the Andante; anon—e.g., in the Scherzo, bright, tuneful, and full of esprit—they sparkle and flash like diamonds in a silver setting; again, they storm with daring impetuosity in unusual rhythms, as in the wonderfully brilliant Finale, which is written in a curious mixture of 5-4 and 6-4 and, later on, 4-4 time. There was not a dull bar in the work. True, the performance, like the music, was very much alive and full of temperament. Rarely have we heard one equally inspiriting. Herr von Dohnányi's style recalls that of Brahms, but very faintly; of absolute reminiscences there seem none, while for effectiveness it has few rivals; at any rate, when performed as on this occasion. The composer played the very difficult pianoforte part (by heart) most brilliantly, and the ensemble was excellent.

THE ELDERHORST QUARTET.

Herr Elderhorst and his party have conscientiously carried out in the past month their scheme of Wednesday afternoon chamber concerts at the Steinway Hall. From October 26 to the 23rd ult., when the sixth concert took place, the following works have been played: Mozart's Quartet in G minor, Haydn's Quartet in G, Beethoven's Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3), Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 97), Schubert's Octet in F (Op. 166), Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 66), Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26), Borodin's Quartet in D (No. 2), and Tschaïkowsky's Pianoforte Trio in A minor (Op. 50). From the above it will be seen that a careful and praiseworthy selection of concerted works has been made, and although, in the majority of instances, the interpretations have been deficient in the perfect sympathy with the music and delicate subtlety of expression upon which the charm of chamber music so greatly depends, the performances have always been thoughtful and musicianly, and have frequently attained excellence. This was specially noticeable in the rendering of Schubert's beautiful Octet, in which the wind parts were played by Messrs. Gomez, Borsdorf, and James, and the strings by Messrs. Elderhorst, Kornfeld, A. Hobday, Whitehouse, and C. Hobday. The pianists who have assisted have been Mr. Isidor Cohn, Madame Haas, Madame Ethel Sharpe, Madame Adelina de Lara, and Herr Otto Hegner, all of whom sustained their respective reputations; and the instrumental music has been pleasantly varied by the singing of Madame Clara Samuell, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Enes Blackmore, and Mr. Walter Ford. Professor Stanford's interesting cycle of songs on Tennyson's "Princess" was included in the programme of the 16th ult., but the lady who sang the soprano part had so different a conception of the pitch to that which was adopted by her three companions that it will be kind to refrain from giving any names. Doubtless they came to a satisfactory agreement immediately after the concert and will do better next time.

The artistic decoration of the platform at these concerts deserves mention. Ferns and red lamp shades may be trifles, but they are distinctly gratifying to those of artistic temperament.

RECITALS.

The autumn is now as busy a time for the musical critic as the summer season, and many recitals worthy of record have been given in the past month.

Too late for mention in our issue for November, but meriting notice in these columns, was the recital given on October 28, at St. James's Hall, by the Misses Anna and Louie Löwe. The former is a pianist with a sympathetic touch and refined style, and she played with reverence some well-known works by the great masters. The latter sang a selection of songs which testified to knowledge of the best in vocal art, and both executants may be encouraged to pursue their studies.

Madame Hanka Schjelderup gave a second recital at the Salle Erard, on the 3rd ult., when she made her first appearance in England as a vocalist. She is gifted with a rich-toned mezzo-soprano voice, which, however, seems to have a will of its own. That will is passionate and excitable, and Madame Schjelderup does not seem able at times to control it; but her interpretation of an admirable selection of songs by Schumann, Schubert, Wagner, Grieg, and Richard Strauss was also characterised by keen musical perception of their several requirements, and her singing, if on a somewhat lower artistic level than her playing, excites esteem and never allows the attention to wander. Her pianoforte pieces on this occasion included Beethoven's Sonata in E (Op. 109), which was finely interpreted.

Dr. Pudor played the violoncello and Madame Sanna Pudor van Rhyn sang to a numerous audience, on the 7th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. Dr. Pudor's style lacks vivacity and Madame Pudor's method is deficient in variety, wherefore a sense of monotony was felt; but the programme was artistic, and the inclusion of four of Cornelius's "Christmas Songs" was commendable, only they should not have been announced as "first performance," since the whole series was sung by Miss Isabel McDougall at her concert at the same hall on December 2, 1897, and repeated by her at the "Pops" last January.

Herr Ernst von Dohnányi, who made his début in England at the Richter concert at the Queen's Hall, on October 24, gave his first pianoforte recital, at St. James's Hall, on the 10th ult. His advent in London will certainly be one of the memorable features of the present autumn season. Few pianists can suggest the deep things of life, but to Herr Dohnányi has been given the power to do so. The heart-cries of humanity rang out with unmistakable voice in his reading of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110). The tenderness and melancholy which permeate the work were expressed with the keenest sympathy, with every shade of feeling, and human heart-beats seemed to pulsate in the music. His interpretation was less broad than that of Mr. d'Albert, but it was more full of points, possessed greater variety, more subtlety, and more mystery. As an exponent of Chopin he could scarcely be judged on this occasion, for he was only heard in the Ballade in G minor (Op. 23) and the Waltz in C sharp minor, but both these works were finely rendered, wayward fancy and delightful delicacy, alternated with the greatest brilliancy, being the prevailing features. Less satisfaction was experienced in a group of pieces from his own pen. These comprised "Variations and a Fugue upon a Theme," a Scherzo in C sharp minor, an Intermezzo in F minor, and a Capriccio in B minor, all of which were remarkable for cleverness of development and brilliancy; but the thematic material was more reminiscent of the styles of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms than original, and the attention was chiefly held by the beauty of their interpretation.

Mr. Bertie Withers gave his first violoncello recital on the 11th ult., at St. James's Hall, and proved himself to be a young executant of exceptional promise. His playing in Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 69)—in which he was ably assisted by Miss Katie Goodson—and of Locatelli's Sonata in D, as arranged by Piatti, and Sir A. C. Mackenzie's expressive and effective Larghetto and Allegretto (Op. 10), was characterised by a musicianly ability and feeling that imparted great interest and charm to his interpretations.

Mr. Ernest Sharpe, the possessor of a genuine bass voice, provided an afternoon's music of great interest on the 15th ult., at St. James's Hall. Mr. Sharpe is manifestly a widely read musician and his songs embraced many schools and styles. For one of the songs was claimed "first performance in England." This is entitled "Gopak," by Moussorgsky, and it proved a remarkable example of Russian music. Several English songs were also admirably rendered, amongst them being Sir Arthur Sullivan's fine song "I would I were a king," written for Mr. Santley, whose manly style is reflected in the music. A notable feature of this recital was the masterly violin playing of Mr. Carl Heinzen, whom we shall hope to hear again at an early date.

Mr. Leonard Sickert, a brother of the painter and formerly a chorister at King's College, Cambridge, succeeded in securing a large audience to hear him sing, on the 15th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. He possesses a good baritone voice which has been well trained, and he rendered an artistic selection of songs with dramatic perception and admirable appreciation of vocal tone colour, being specially successful in his interpretation of Loewe's ballad "Herr Olaf."

Miss Maud Powell, who gave a recital on the 22nd ult., is a violinist of the first rank, and should be frequently heard in London concert-rooms. She produces a beautiful tone from her instrument, and her executive command and power of expression are of the first order. Her programme included Rust's Sonata in D minor, three movements from Bach's Sonata in E, Wieniawski's "Fantaisie de Faust," and several small pieces of artistic interest, all of which were interpreted with musicianly perception of the character of the music and notable brilliancy and delicacy, as occasion required.

Miss Isadora Lara and Mr. Douglas Lott were responsible for a vocal recital at Queen's (Small) Hall on the 2nd ult. By meritorious renderings of songs by Schubert, Korbay, and others, Mr. Lott, a baritone, justified his appearance; but his companion, whose soprano voice has more strength than sweetness, was scarcely so successful. The capabilities of Mr. Sigmund Oppenheim, a new-comer, as an interpreter of Chopin, were not clear, though he played Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 81A, with some judgment. Miss Florence Leoni's bright solos on the violin were highly acceptable.

Mdlle. Lina Multerer, the pianist who gave a recital at St. James's Hall on the 18th ult., was so overcome by nervousness that she was unable to cope with the exacting demands of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110). Her performance of some lighter pieces was characterised by grace and fancy. A decided success was achieved by Mdlle. Marie Boedcher, a mezzo-soprano, who appeared here for the first time, and in airs by Beethoven, Bruch, Rubinstein, and Fielitz gave evidence of good training and clear perception of varying styles.

LONDON CHURCH CHOIRS AT ST. PAUL'S.

No more interesting festival is held annually in the metropolitan Cathedral than that of the London Church Choirs Association, inasmuch as it not only practically illustrates the great advance in the rendering of musical services during the past quarter of a century, but serves to stimulate composers to add to the wealth of sacred works of which the nation has reason to be proud. In no respect was the twenty-fifth of these gatherings, which took place on the 17th ult., inferior to any of its predecessors. Sir George Martin conducted a choir totalling close upon 1,300, representing sixty-four churches in London and the suburbs, and several interesting features marked the selection of the music. Among them were a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, specially composed for the occasion by Dr. E. J. Hopkins, whose conspicuous ability, no less than his altogether exceptional experience, commands consideration for every production from his pen. As usual, Dr. Hopkins has without effort succeeded in combining simplicity with the highest degree of effectiveness. The Magnificat is a free and spontaneous outburst of praise, strong and forcible without being strident. Though the tone is joyous throughout, there is sufficient variety of treatment to engross attention. The Nunc dimittis is appropriately smooth and tranquil. Both compositions are admirable examples of the better class of service designed for general use. The anthem was a setting by Myles B. Foster of Psalm cxxvi., "When the Lord turned again," the special Psalms were sung to chants by Sir George Martin, the hymns were to tunes by Lemare, Hoyte, Charles Macpherson, Walter E. Mansell, and Basil Harwood, and, after the sermon (preached by the Bishop of St. Albans), the chorus from "Samson," "Let their celestial concerts," was given. Mr. C. Macpherson and Mr. Kiddle were at the organ.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The chamber concert on October 26 opened with a capital performance of Dvorák's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 51) by Helen Egerton, a new-comer, who played with uncommon confidence and a good tone; Margaret Wishart, Ernest Tomlinson, and R. Purcell Jones. The other concerted piece was Brahms's great C minor Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 60), in which John Ireland, Kitty Woolley, and the above-mentioned young gentlemen seemed somewhat overweighted. It is but right to say, however, that Mr. Jones played the famous violoncello melody in the Andante very expressively. Edgar Bainton introduced with much success two pianoforte compositions of his own, a set of Variations, both ingenious and musically interesting, and a Rhapsody, which, though not without good points, appealed less to us. Mary Lee sang a Handel air ("Dove sei? amato bene!" from "Rodelinda") with a good voice, but her efforts were marred by nervousness; and Nelly Brickley's fresh, clear voice was well displayed in Bach's lovely air "My heart ever faithful," in which, moreover, she displayed some feeling.

At the chamber concert of the 4th ult. the concerted pieces were Mozart's String Quartet in E flat (1783), carefully and sympathetically played by Evelyn Hunter, Madeleine Booth, Edward Behr, and Edward Mason; and Brahms's Trio for pianoforte, violin, and horn, which was successfully interpreted by Maud Gay, a refined, artistic pianist, William Read, and Herbert Thornton, who bids fair to become an excellent performer upon the most human amongst orchestral instruments. Florence Smith created some excitement amongst her fellow-students by her playing of Chopin's Fantasia in F minor (Op. 49). Her friends are no mean judges, for she is a gifted little lass. Great fluency, combined with accuracy and well expressed feeling, marked her clever performance.

At the following concert, on the 11th ult., the orchestra distinguished itself greatly in the sparkling Overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville." What delightful simplicity, tunefulness, and esprit after the overdose of billposter art à la Slave we have had to endure of late! The strings, always excellent at the College, revelled in the gay and sunshiny music. Schumann's beautiful and very German "Oriental Pictures" (Op. 66), reverentially yet effectively scored by Carl Reinecke, proved a good contrast to Rossini's strains, and fell upon the ear most pleasantly. Cicely Gleeson-White sang Beethoven's deeply expressive "Busslied" (Song of Penitence) with genuine feeling and artistic restraint, her pronunciation of the German text, moreover, being highly commendable. The accompaniments had been scored for orchestra by a fellow student, A. R. Cripps, whose work merits ungrudging appreciation. His orchestration is well done; appropriate and effective, yet nowhere obtrusive, it lends additional expressiveness and a sensuous charm to a song that in this new guise will no doubt be more frequently heard than heretofore. Beethoven's C minor Symphony received a spirited, masculine reading, the large number of lady fiddlers notwithstanding. It was an exhilarating performance. But it was not these fine things which drew the enormous, virtually overflowing audience to the South Kensington "matchbox."

The crowd came to hear a novelty with which many-tongued rumour had been busy for weeks past—viz., Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," now to be produced for the first time. It was but right that the young composer's Alma Mater should be the first to present the finest work of the most gifted amongst its pupils to a London audience, and if the performance was not ideally perfect, if the choir was ill-balanced (a few male singers against scores of sopranos and contraltos), the enthusiastic orchestra occasionally a little rough through over-eagerness, and the tenor soloist overweighted in the perfectly beautiful song "Onaway! Awake, beloved!" there was yet manifest in the work of conductor, orchestra, chorus, and soloist such an ardent desire to do the utmost for a work of which all seemed proud, that only hyper-criticism could think of grumbling.

As to the work itself, we need say nothing after the lengthy review which appeared in our last issue, and of which we see no occasion to withdraw one single word.

That the orchestral colouring improves the cantata immensely we need hardly say, for Mr. Taylor has proved ere this that he handles the colour-machine yclept the full modern orchestra as to the manner born. We have brilliancy, sonority, daintiness, and sensuous charm side by side, and the strongly marked and much-varied rhythms appear yet more marked and more varied in the full score, in the beat of drum, the crash of brass, and the elastic stepping of the violins. But, as we are never tired of insisting, orchestral colouring alone will never make great music. There must be melody, melody, and again melody! And that Mr. Taylor has in abundance. Though we do not of course, consider the little cantata a great masterpiece, nor hail the twenty-three year old composer as one who has nothing more to learn, we would fain protest against the assumption that the work is a lucky fluke. Mr. Taylor is no novice at composing, and the present work is but the outcome of the legitimate, though very rapid development of his powers. That he adopted an original and peculiar style for a peculiar and original poem, and that he set that poem so successfully is in itself no mean achievement. It does not follow that he cannot write in another style. He has long learned the art of symphonic development, as other and earlier works of his have shown. But that art would not have availed him much in this particular cantata, and so we have what we consider a wonderfully fresh, buoyant, vigorous, and, especially as regards the latter portion, quite beautiful and poetic little work, which appeals to all and yet repays close examination. And now let us leave the gifted young composer happy with his remarkable success. He will do much better yet, for he has the gifts and strength and the modesty for higher things.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

As usual, satisfactory proof of the existence of much well-trained talent was forthcoming at the concert given on the 14th ult., at St. James's Hall, by the students of the Royal Academy of Music. In order of merit and importance, and also of performance, the last piece on the programme demands notice first. This was a Suite in G for strings by Christopher Wilson, ex-student and Mendelssohn Scholar of the Institution. The work comprises six movements, which are distinguished by pleasing melodic invention, well balanced form, and skilful craftsmanship, and it was excellently played by the ensemble class, under the able direction of Mr. Emile Sauret. A slow movement and a Rondo, presumably from a work in classic form, by Percy Hilder Miles, were chiefly interesting as efforts of a promising student. They are laid out for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello, and were neatly rendered by Marguerite Elzy, the composer, and S. V. Shea, Lionel Tertis, and Bertie Withers. Other instrumental performances worthy of record were Maud Horne's neat violin playing in a Ballade by Dvorák and a Moto Perpetuo by Edward German, and Claude F. Pollard's rendering of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques." An excellent interpretation was given of Brahms's six Vocal Quartets (Op. 112) by Ethel Wood, Mrs. Julia Franks, Whitworth Mitton, and Robert Bradford. The voices blended delightfully, and the ensemble was admirable. Gertrude Drinkwater and Jane Spicer showed dramatic perception in the fiery duet between Gioconda and Laura from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." It was sung in English, and those amongst the audience who were unacquainted with the opera must have been somewhat startled by the vehemence of the language. Such exclamations as "Blasphemer!" and "Thou liest" sounded unparliamentary in the room sacred to the memory this autumn of the Monday "Pops." Other young aspirants who appeared were Kathleen Applin, Mary Bowmaker, R. V. Tabb, William R. Maxwell, and H. Willis Stanley—the two last-named being vocalists of decided promise.

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The distribution of prizes in connection with this school took place as usual at the annual students' concert held in the Guildhall on October 29. Among the pupils affording practical testimony to excellent tuition were Miss Madeline Payne, who played Moszkowski's "Caprice Espagnol" for the pianoforte with accuracy as well as brilliancy; Miss Alice Read, who very tastefully sang the air from "Nadeshda," "My heart is weary"; and Miss Karen Bramsen, whose rendering of Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccio" for violin was exceptionally commendable.

After the concert the Lady Mayoress distributed the prizes. The three highest associates were Mr. R. Reynolds (pianoforte), who was awarded the gold medal; Mr. A. M. Borwell (singing), who took the silver medal; and Miss F. M. Barrett (elocution), who won the bronze medal. The Knill prize was awarded to Miss Madeline Payne. Other special prizes were:—The Musicians' Company silver medal for "the most distinguished student," Miss Fanny Woolf; the Taylor gold medal, Mr. D. G. Boxhall; the George Alexander prize, Mr. A. G. Liddiard; the Hill prize, Mr. G. H. Wilson; the Dove memorial for "general excellence, assiduity, and industry," Mr. J. S. Gordon; the Cobbett Composition prize, Mr. A. C. Umlauff; the Lord Mayor's prize for soprano vocalists, Miss E. M. Farrow; the Lady Mayoress's, for pianists, Miss Millie Parsons; and the Chairman's prize for organ students, Miss H. L. Cartwright. The Sheriffs' prizes for contraltos and mezzo-sopranos fell to Miss Ethel Chovil and Miss Alice Read.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

Sir Frederick Bridge concluded his autumn series of music lectures in connection with Gresham College on October 28. The first of the discourses was delivered in the theatre of the College, and the subject chosen was the life and compositions of John Hilton, who first appeared as a composer in "The triumphs of Oriana," in 1601. To this work he contributed a five-part Madrigal, entitled "Faire Oriana, Beautie's Queen." This and a number of other examples by this "Old Musical Worthy" were sung by the choristers of Westminster Abbey, and proved very interesting specimens of seventeenth century music. One Catch in particular, called "Here lies a Woman," created much amusement.

The second lecture, which was delivered in the great hall of the City of London School, was a continuation of the discourses upon English organ music, and the works considered on this occasion were those of John Stanley, who, in spite of losing his eyesight when two years old, became one of the most brilliant organists of his day and supreme in his use of tone-colour. He was appointed organist at All Hallows', Bread Street, at the age of eleven, and in July, 1729, being then only sixteen years of age, took the Oxford degree of Bachelor of Music, becoming thereby the youngest musical graduate with one exception, Thomas Ravenscourt, who was under sixteen when he took the degree at Cambridge. He possessed a marvellous memory and was sixty years organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn. He also played the violin. When Handel became blind it was proposed that Stanley should take his place, but Handel remarked "That it would be the blind leading the blind," and the appointment was given to John Christopher Smith. Stanley's first published compositions were eight solos for German flute, violin, or harpsichord, the music being so written that it could be played by any one or by all the instruments. These works were not mentioned in Grove's Dictionary. He also wrote cantatas and oratorios, notably "Zimri." In illustration of the lecturer's remarks, two of Stanley's organ voluntaries were played by Dr. A. Bly, and several concertos for strings and harpsichord were rendered by an efficient band, under the direction of Mr. J. E. Borland.

The third discourse was a continuation of previous lectures on the development of oratorio. The work treated of in this instance was Bach's "St. Luke" Passion. Concerning the composition of this the lecturer said there was not much known, and there were some musicians who denied that the work was by Bach at all, amongst such being Mendelssohn. The manuscript, however, was in Bach's handwriting and comprised thirty-three chorales, five arias, and a trio. In the lecturer's opinion the music was by the great Leipzig master. An interesting description was given of the construction of the work, and a number of excerpts were admirably sung by Miss Gambogi, Miss Holding, Miss Stonex, and Messrs. Oakley, Fell, and Mills.

The fourth lecture was entitled "Mozart as a child in London." The lecturer said he had on a previous occasion spoken of Mozart as a man and a teacher, but now he wished to draw attention to his childhood, and in particular to the discovery of a sketch-book which Mozart kept when in London. Mozart first visited this country in 1763, being brought here by his father as a prodigy. He was accompanied by his sister, with whom he played duets, but his solo performances were the attraction. His father advertised him as "The wonder of nature," and he was first heard at a concert in Spring Gardens. The sketch-book was written in London in 1764. Selections from the thirteen pieces it contained were given, and proved of some interest as the early efforts of genius. Other examples, played by Miss Jessie Grimson and the lecturer, were from the Sonatas for violin and clavecin (Op. 3), composed by Mozart when eight years old, and dedicated to Queen Charlotte.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE MEMORIZING OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

The twenty-fourth session of the Musical Association was opened at the Royal College of Organists on the 8th ult., when a paper of much originality and practical value was read by Dr. Frederick G. Shinn, who took for his subject "The memorising of pianoforte music for performance."

Dr. Shinn said that every student was interested in the memorizing of music, for it entered in great degree into all stages of his progress, and, considering its wide-reaching importance, it was surprising to find no literature existed on the subject, save incidental mention of it in certain primers. Musical memory might be divided into four forms—aural, muscular, visual, and intellectual. Music being the language of sound, the memory of the ear was the most important. A well trained ear could not only retain, but could reproduce what had been heard, and as the power of any organ depended upon its discriminating capability, it was highly desirable that ear-training should receive more attention than it did at present. Moreover, ear memory was necessary to judge the results produced, even when the other forms of memory were employed. Muscular memory was by some players almost entirely trusted to. When a passage had to be repeated many times to attain its perfect execution, it ultimately could be played accurately without conscious control of the intellect. The employment of this form was most suitable in music of a brilliant character, such as arpeggi, scale passages, and repetitions of certain figures. Visual memory consisted of two main forms: memory of the written or printed notation, and memory of the positions and sequence of notes on the keyboard. This was in reality a very delicate form of muscular memory. The eye often rendered unwilling service, it being forcibly made to remember by repetition, particularly extended passages. The eye was more retentive than any other sense, but its service might be entirely dispensed with. Intellectual memory might be regarded as consisting of memory of the form in which a piece was planned, of its harmonic basis, and of the elaboration of this basis. Theoretical knowledge was, of course, obligatory for the exercise of this form of memory. The kind of memory chiefly used depended upon the idiosyncrasy of the player, and the selection was usually unconscious, but was probably ruled by natural or acquired aptitude for a particular form. Pianists should seek to chiefly employ and rely upon the form for which they possessed special capability, but they would undoubtedly derive help from consideration of the subject.

Dr. Shinn's remarks were illustrated by examples from the great composers, chosen with regard to the particular form of memory which would be best employed in memorising them, these excerpts being admirably played by Miss Fédarb.

At the conclusion of the paper Mr. W. H. Cummings, who occupied the chair, made some interesting remarks, particularly with reference to the methods employed in teaching the blind; and in the subsequent discussion opinions and experiences were given by Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. Huntley, Mrs. Curwen, Mr. Stephen Kemp, Mr. H. Davey, and Mr. Macdonald Smith.

ANNUAL DINNER.

Later in the evening the members and their friends dined at the Holborn Restaurant in celebration of the twenty-fifth year of the foundation of the Association.

In proposing the chief toast of the evening, Sir Hubert Parry said that no doubt all present would drink to the health of their noble selves with the greatest complacency; and he only regretted that, in the absence of Sir John Stainer, a more effective stop-gap had not been selected to expatiate in a worthy manner on the objects and advantages of membership of such an Association. He specially wished that its founder could have been present. The speaker well remembered the condition of things in Oxford five-and-twenty years ago, when the idea of such an Association for the discussion of musical topics first arose. There was a readiness to discuss any question which might present itself—to discuss it informally and sometimes without much knowledge—but still to discuss it, when, through the influence of the late Dr. Corfe and the advocacy of Sir John Stainer, the Musical Association came into being in 1874. Sir Hubert Parry thought that all members should study Sir John Stainer's inaugural address given at the opening of the twenty-first session; indeed, it would not be a bad plan to have this read aloud to the members every session. Looking through the past records of the Association, it seemed that in early days it was especially fond of scientific subjects; in middle life it was devoted to philosophy; and at present the tendency is to become more practical. But, whatever the subject, it was desirable that discussion of it should be free. The result might sometimes be that the Association would be made to suffer by the wind-bags that are to be found at all such gatherings, but a student of human nature, or a person with any sense of humour, might contrive to enjoy himself very well even under such inflictions. We all knew the enthusiastic person who did not know a dominant seventh from a semibreve rest, and we knew also the diligent grubber who spent his life in collecting facts, and massed a marvellous store of materials, but had not the ability to put them in any sort of order to make proper use of them, or draw true conclusions. There was much research work waiting to be done, which the Association was just the body to undertake; in this way it might be made a great power.

Other speakers were Mr. Clifford Edgar, General Chamier, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Prendergast.

MR. CHARLES FRY'S RECITALS.

The three recitals of Shakespeare's plays given by Mr. Charles Fry at St. George's Hall will be remembered by many as a pleasing feature of this autumn season. Save for the absence of scenery, these recitals are handsomely dressed stage performances, judiciously curtailed to fall within about two hours, and furnished with incidental music of artistic value. Judging by the large attendances, they meet a want. Certainly they are of special value to the young, for a knowledge of the Bard of Avon's masterpieces is obligatory on all who would claim to be cultured, and the requisite acquaintance can be no more easily and pleasantly gained than by invoking the assistance of the eye and ear.

The plays presented were "Hamlet," on October 29, and "Romeo and Juliet" and "Twelfth Night," on the 5th and 12th ult. respectively. Detailed criticism on the acting is not of course called for in these columns. Suffice it to say that Mr. Charles Fry, Miss Olive Kennett, and Mr. Ernest Meads elicited marked approval in their respective impersonations, while others calling for special mention are Miss Olive Morton, Mrs. Thouless, Mr. Arthur Payne, Mr. Adrian Harley, Mr. E. Webster, and Mr. H. Lane Wilson. The latter showed great aptitude for acting as the Clown in "Twelfth Night," and sang with admirable effect "O mistress mine," to a traditional air of the sixteenth century; Arne's "Come away, Death," and Professor Villiers Stanford's setting of "When that I was and a tiny little boy." The incidental music at the first two performances was that written specially for Mr. Fry's recitals by the late Berthold Tours, and it was played by an efficient small orchestra conducted by Mr. Frank Tours and Mr. William A. Gardner.

At the first performance Mr. Fry was presented by his many pupils with a carved oak "Hamlet" chair; a timely and appropriate gift to one who has induced many to take down the family Shakespeare.

MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR'S "HIAWATHA'S WEDDING-FEAST" AT SUNDERLAND.

Reckoning the Royal College students' concert as private, which one may fairly do, the credit of introducing to the public Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's new cantata, "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," may be assigned to the enterprise of the Sunderland Philharmonic Society. This is one of several societies in the North of England that owe so much to a well-known amateur, Mr. Kilburn. The list of out-of-the-way works that have been given under his conductorship at Sunderland, Middlesbrough, and Bishop Auckland would be hard to surpass, or even approach, by any district in provincial England, excepting only the festival towns; but one of the most interesting novelties they have produced is undoubtedly the cantata given at Sunderland on the 16th ult. It would be interesting were it the work of a thoroughly mature musician, but the interest is enormously enhanced when we know that the composer is at the threshold of his career, and that this is his first published choral work.

For this reason one is inclined to look upon "Hiawatha" almost more for the promise it implies than for its intrinsic merit. To do so, however, is not entirely just, for it may be said that it has the great virtue of being a thoroughly convincing setting of Longfellow's words, admirably sustained and full of real beauty of both colour and melody. It is in the spontaneity and freshness of the melody that, as it seems to us, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor shows such promise. Tunefulness—by which is not of necessity implied the power to produce melodies cut into four-bar lengths—is one of the first essentials of the composer, the more important since it is least easily acquired. It is possible that he may, by practice and experience, become more skilled in developing his materials, but he would be in a far worse case had he no material to develop. Of one important factor in melody—rhythm—Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has ample store. His music pulsates with rhythmical energy, and even the incessant, and, indeed, rather monotonous metre of Longfellow's poem does not seem to affect the variety of the music. In one rather obvious respect he is peculiarly fitted to deal with such a poem as "Hiawatha." Like Tschaïkowsky in his most characteristic movements, there is a certain barbaric opulence about his music, an absence of any apparent labour, and a passionate energy that are in perfect keeping with the subject. Dvorák, who has anticipated him in treating of "the forest primeval," has hardly a greater wealth of fresh melodic ideas.

Another of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's virtues is that, unlike most young composers, he is practical, and his music produces its effect without any disproportionate expenditure of means. Sudden as are the changes in harmony or in rhythm, they are not forced, or introduced simply for effect's sake, and the whole of this little cantata—it takes just thirty-six minutes in performance—has the great charm of perfect spontaneity. It is very evident that the subject has appealed very strongly to the composer's imagination, otherwise it is difficult to understand how he could have infused so much interest into the many lines of Longfellow's poem that most certainly do not yearn for musical expression. The description of the guests' clothing, the detailed menu of the wedding-feast, the catalogue of the wardrobe of Pau-Puk-Keewis, the mystic dancer; all these are somewhat tiresome, though not altogether out of place in a descriptive poem. To a composer who "could set a placard to music" they would, of course, present no difficulty; but in these days, when the musician leans more exclusively upon the poet, they might well prove a stumbling-block. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, however, has an impetuosity that carries him right through; the freshness and vitality of his music carry all before them and give colour and interest to even the least emotional lines of the poem.

Where, however, a genuine emotion has been provided for him, he has not been behindhand. The culminating point of the poem is, of course, the love-song, "Onaway! Awake, beloved!" This is set as a tenor solo, and its passionate character is admirably reflected in the music, which is thoroughly vocal, while the orchestra is treated with the same wealth of colour as is found elsewhere, together with a still higher degree of finish in matters of detail. It was sung with much expression at Sunderland by Mr. Lloyd Chandos. In other respects the performance, under the composer's direction, was remarkably good, remembering that there was a "scratch" band, which had to tackle a difficult and elaborate score after a single rehearsal; that there was no rehearsal of band and chorus together; and that all were working under a strange conductor. These are the usual conditions that obtain with our provincial choral societies, and it is indeed wonderful that they achieve so much when so heavily handicapped.

MISS HENNIKER'S CHORAL COMPETITIONS IN SUFFOLK.

The scheme of the Hon. Miss Henniker's choral competitions in the county of Suffolk appears to have been taken up with much earnestness. At the second competition, which took place at Ipswich on the 3rd ult., the number of competitors (nearly 400) showed an increase upon those attending last year, an earnest that the object aimed at was being attained—viz., "To bind together all who love music, whether as teachers, conductors, singers, or players, for the common purpose of advancing musical art." Associated with Miss Henniker were Miss Whitbread, the Hon. D. Tollemache, Mr. A. W. Barry, Mr. W. W. Sinclair, and many amateur and professional musicians of the county. The judges were Miss Wakefield, Mr. Arthur Somervell, Mr. Lionel Benson, and Mr. Albert Visetti. The competitions were divided into junior and senior, these again being sub-divided into classes—part-song, sight-singing, solo singing, &c. The proceedings of the day were followed by a concert in the evening, when Mendelssohn's "Christus" was given by several of the choirs, accompanied by a small string band, led by Rev. T. S. Shaw, conducted by Mr. Visetti. The soloists were Miss Whitbread, Messrs. Thomas, Dalby, and Douglas Powell. The Ipswich Nonconformist Union, who had taken first prize in the afternoon for its singing of Mendelssohn's chorus "See what love" ("St. Paul"), repeated its performance in the evening. Mr. Mower's party also repeated its first prize essay for unaccompanied quartet singing, Bishop's "Sleep, gentle lady," while the Belstead village choir, who took the first prize for accompanied part-songs, gave its winning piece, Ford's "Since first I saw your face." Other songs were given in capital style by the Hon. Miss Henniker, Mr. Owen Morgan, Miss A. M. Wakefield, Mr. Douglas Powell, Miss Whitbread, Prince Frederic Duleep Singh, and Mr. Thomas. Mr. Paul Ludwig played several violoncello solos in a finished style. Between the parts Lady Evelyn Cobbold presented the prizes to those successful in the competitions.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Village Chant Book. No. 1, containing 100 Single Chants; No. 2, containing 50 Double Chants. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Visitors to country churches will often find in the choir stalls manuscript books of chants, invariably in a dilapidated condition and of a caligraphy that is distinctly bucolic in its attempts at "pricking" music, as old writers pointedly remarked. The issue of the above chant books will obviate the necessity of making manuscript collections. Who would take the trouble of copying them out when 100 single chants can be bought for sixpence, and 50 double chants for the same small coin of the realm? As to the plan of these books, we cannot do better than quote from the preface: "The chants contained in this collection have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no case exceeds C natural." This is an excellent idea which, with one exception (No. 23 in the double chants), has been strictly carried out. Moreover, "the requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which, it is hoped, will materially aid an important part of Divine Service." When it is stated that, in addition to those old favourites endeared by long use, the two books under notice contain chants by modern composers like Barnby, Bridge, Hopkins, Stainer, and others, there is no need to further enlarge upon the merits of these useful publications. The books are issued in a very convenient size and the printing thereof is everything that can be desired.

Langsyne. Duet for Soprano and Contralto. The words by Alexander Anderson. Set to music by Alicia Adélaïde Needham. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

This life is a fleeting breath. Song. The words by Louise Chandler Moulton. Set to music by Alicia Adélaïde Needham. [Boosey and Co.]

My heart's treasure. Song. The words (translated from the Irish) by Francis A. Fahy. Music by Alicia Adélaïde Needham. [Chappell and Co., Limited.]

Mrs. Needham has with such rapid strides reached an enviable position as one of the most popular and successful song writers of the day, that each new composition from her pen produces an excusable curiosity as to how she would succeed in other and more serious branches of her art. Wherefore we hope she may ere long produce something of greater import than the above-mentioned pieces for instance. We are not in love with the English (or Irish) ballad "as she is wrote" in these days, though the latter are in this respect, no doubt, an improvement on the "dark" days of English music. Our composers—those, we mean, with a soul above the common or garden ballad—are able to hold their own with Continental masters in the production of high-class art songs. Mrs. Needham also has in her album of "Hush Songs" written several simple ditties that have given us genuine satisfaction, even when judged by a high standard. And here we may remark that the simpler this clever composer is, the more she relies on the strength of her vocal melody without overloading the accompaniment with details, the better we are pleased. It is for this reason that we prefer the duet of the publications under notice. It is tuneful and expressive, and there is a ring of warm sentiment about it which well reproduces the homely lyric (in the Scotch dialect) with its reference to—

Langsyne when life was bonnie
An' a' the skies were blue,
When ilka thocht took blossom
An' hung its heid wi' dew.

"This life is a fleeting breath" is a sombre and stern setting of a long but impressive poem. It could be made effective by a singer with a dramatic style and a good feeling for climax.

"My heart's treasure," an impassioned Irish love song, will find many admirers. Mr. Fahy's excellent lyric strikes a somewhat tragic note, and Mrs. Needham has caught its spirit and reproduced its passionate yearning with much success.

The Office for the Holy Communion. Set to music in the key of E flat. By John E. West.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

This setting of the Communion Service merits the attention of all choirmasters who have fairly capable choirs. The music allied to the Kyrie Eleison may be said to be indicative of that which follows. It is devotional and impressive in character, and while possessing considerable warmth of expression is also distinguished by reverential dignity. The Credo is set out with some elaborateness, short interludes for the organ being interspersed between the delivery of the sentences. The passage beginning "And was Incarnate" is given to a soprano soloist, who is answered impressively by the full choir at the words "And was made man." A similar device, but with bass soloist, is adopted for the passages beginning "And was crucified" and "He suffered." A recurrence of the opening intonation precedes the declamation, fortissimo, "And the third day," and from thence to the end of the first section of the Creed the music proceeds with considerable vigour. In the second section a notable point is made at the words "Who spake by the Prophets," a fine effect being secured by the transition from the dominant chord on D to the key of six flats. The Sanctus is commenced by the basses with a flowing theme, which is answered by the other voices in the choir, and the number is concluded in a most effective manner. The Benedictus is begun by a soprano vocalist, who gives out a placid melody which is afterwards taken up by the full choir, the soloists continuing to lead them down to the words "Hosanna," which is set in contrapuntal fashion. A bass or baritone soloist begins the Agnus Dei, which contains some phrases of great melodic beauty, and this number forms a fine contrast to the Gloria, which is set with much vigour and terminates with the exposition of a fugue subject and floridly written Amen. The vocal parts are well laid out for the voice, and the organ accompaniment possesses much musical interest and independence.

A Merry Christmas. A collection of Pianoforte Compositions by modern Composers.
[Breitkopf and Härtel.]

Christmas-tide is a gift-giving season, but what to give, even to one's nearest and one's dearest, often causes brain racking, for the acceptableness of a present depends on the pleasure it can afford the recipient. In this respect Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel's volume of pianoforte solos may be relied upon to please all pianists of average abilities. The collection consists of twenty-five pieces by Armand, Fielitz, Götze, Grimm, Hartmann, Hofmann, Jadassohn, Junkelmann, Keudell, MacDowell, Merkel, Nesvera, Rheinberger, Ribiollet, Sartorio, Scharwenka, Schwab, Seiss, Verhey, and Wagner, and they have been chosen with admirable discretion. Several of them are gems of their kind, and in the large majority the maximum of effectiveness is combined with the minimum of difficulty, but all of them possess musical charm.

Ständchen (Serenade); Die Linde (The Linden Tree). Edited and translated by Helen D. Tretbar. Music by Erik Meyer-Helmund.
[Magdeburg: Heinrichshofen's Verlag.]

Both these songs are worthy of the attention of vocalists. In the first a lover asks sundry questions of the cottage where his beloved dwells, and not receiving an answer, is content to commit her safety to the silent walls. Serenades, as a rule, have much in common, but Herr Helmund's music possesses some distinction and, as expected from this composer, has many artistic touches.

"The Linden Tree," in the poet's imagination, grows outside a cottage in which a loved one dwells, and has the peculiar property of communicating to her the vows of devotion which her lover has breathed on its leaves. The voice part is melodious and graceful, and the effectiveness of the song is greatly increased by the musical interest of the pianoforte accompaniment, which, however, calls for deft fingers to do it justice.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Trios, Quartets, &c., for Female Voices. Nos. 317 to 320.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

It was an excellent idea to include in this series female choruses from cantatas, for some of the most pleasing examples of this kind are found in modern works. No. 317 is the chorus "Hasten, Oh! sisters," from the cantata "King Neptune's Daughter," by Ferris Tozer. It is written in three parts in a flowing and graceful style and is extremely easy to sing. The next number is the soprano solo and chorus "Fairest of lands," from "The Sun Worshippers," by A. Goring Thomas. This makes more demand on executive abilities than the preceding number, and the soprano soloist is in one instance called upon to touch the high B natural. The chorus parts also require singing with vivacity and brightness; but any trouble expended will receive its reward. No. 319, entitled "Eidola," is a setting for three voices, by F. Cunningham Woods, of words from an Elizabethan Song Book, in which the singers speculate upon whether shadows can give pleasure, and apparently find that they can; certainly Mr. Woods's music will. Mr. Woods also supplies No. 320, and in this instance has gone to Richard Brome, a worthy of the seventeenth century, for words to inspire his pen. The number is entitled "The Merry Beggars." It is not revealed why these particular beggars should be merry, but they certainly are so in the composer's estimation, and his music trips along with pleasing vivacity.

Without Thee. Song. French words by Victor Hugo. English adaptation by Raymond St. Leonards. Music by Guy d'Hardelot.

O! Like a Queen. Words by William Watson. Music by Frances Allitsen.

Just for once. Words by Ernest Pertwee. Music by Sybil Palliser. [E. Ascherberg and Co.]

Vocalists in search of new songs may be recommended the above-mentioned. "Without Thee" is published in three keys, and its sentiments may be expressed with equal appropriateness by either sex. In the English version it is not quite clear whether the loved one is close by, far away, alive or dead; but those singers who are troubled about this can take refuge in Victor Hugo's own lines. The voice part is grateful to sing, and the persistency of a musical figure adds to the interest of the pianoforte accompaniment.

The setting of "O! Like a Queen" is in Miss Allitsen's best manner, and baritones will find in it an effective song of vigorous and manly sentiment.

"Just for once" is a piquant little ditty which might be made to serve a useful purpose by ladies who wish to encourage nervous and diffident swains. Mr. Pertwee has mixed up his singular and plural pronouns somewhat recklessly in his search for rhymes; but otherwise his lines are commendable, and their coquettish spirit has been deftly caught by Miss Palliser and expressed in dainty music.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The musical season here is now in full swing. During the past month we have had experience of various forms of musical art. The late Sir Charles Hallé's famous band, under the direction of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, gave a concert in the Ulster Hall, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. The attendance was not commensurate with the rich musical treat presented; but what the audience lacked in numbers was more than made up for in their enthusiasm, every piece in the programme being received with a storm of applause.

An interesting concert was given in the Ulster Hall on the 11th ult., by Mr. and Madame Louis Mantell, who took farewell of their numerous friends here, previous to departure for London, where they intend to reside permanently. Some sixteen artists showed their appreciation and sympathy by lending their services, the result being a highly successful concert.

The latest venture took place on the 19th ult.—namely, a new series of People's Concerts, at the first of which Gounod's "Redemption" was performed by the band and chorus of the Philharmonic Society, with solos taken by local amateurs, and at the popular prices of one shilling and sixpence. It is intended to do other works later on. The experiment is an interesting one, and should succeed, as heretofore the performances of such works have been at prices entirely prohibitive to the masses. It remains to be seen whether the taste for ballad concerts may not give place to oratorio and the grand works of the great masters.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The marked appreciation and enthusiastic welcome bestowed last season on Mr. Halford's orchestral concerts have induced him to give another series of ten concerts, the first of which took place in our Town Hall on October 25, the second on the 8th ult. This year's scheme includes Beethoven's nine Symphonies, to be given in chronological order. At the first concert Mr. Halford gave Brahms's Symphony (No. 1) in C minor, remarkably well played by the orchestra. The place of honour, however, was assigned to Sir Hubert Parry's Symphonic Variations in E minor, given under the composer's conductorship, who was accorded a very hearty welcome. The performance was a very fine one, and full justice was done to Sir Hubert Parry's masterly score. Mons. Emile Sauret was the only soloist, and gave his own Concerto in D minor (Op. 26) in a manner that revealed his wonderful mastery of the violin to perfection. At the second concert Beethoven's first Symphony and Borodine's second Symphony were the principal orchestral pieces. Mr. Louis Frölich sang Wotan's "Abschied," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," and Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh."

The first of Dr. Rowland Winn's series of orchestral concerts was given in the Town Hall on the 3rd ult., with decidedly artistic results. The programme included Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Wagner's Overture "The Flying Dutchman," Tschaïkowsky's Overture "Romeo and Juliet," and Saint-Saëns's Symphonic Poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale." Miss Esther Palliser was the vocalist and sang Max Bruch's "Ave Maria, stainless Queen," from the choral work "Das Feuerkreuz," also the Jewel Song from Gounod's "Faust."

Through the absence of Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap, on account of a sudden breakdown in health, the first orchestral concert of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society was conducted by Professor Villiers Stanford, the event taking place in our Town Hall, on the 10th ult. The choir gave Brahms's "Triumphlied," which has not been heard here since it was given for the first and only time at our musical festival of 1882. A very fine rendering of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was secured by Dr. Stanford. Mons. Hollmann achieved an extraordinary success with Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto in A minor (Op. 33). For his second solo he gave Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," based on a Hebrew melody still in use in the Synagogue on the Day of Atonement.

The Midland Musical Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" in the Town Hall, on October 29, under Mr. Stevenson's conductorship, the principals being Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Minnie Hackett, Mr. Shakespeare Robinson (late tenor of York Minster), Mr. Edward Field, Mr. Philip H. Clark, and Mr. William Bennett. Mr. C. W. Perkins occupied his accustomed place at the organ. The performance showed a marked improvement on former efforts. The chorus sang well throughout, their attack being firm and the tone quality rich.

The Birmingham Choral Union gave, in celebration of the centenary of its first production, Haydn's "Creation," in the Town Hall, on the 5th ult., under Mr. Thomas Facer's conductorship. The principals were Miss Annie Norledge, Mr. Hamlyn Crimp, Mr. William Evans, and Mr. C. W. Perkins (organ). It was a capital performance throughout, the chorus being in splendid form.

Messrs. Fred. Ward, violinist, and Percy Stranders, pianist, have organised a series of three chamber concerts, the first of which was given in the Masonic Hall, on the 2nd ult. The performers were, in addition to the concert-givers, Mr. W. H. Ward (viola) and Mr. F. A. Ward (violoncello). Miss Annie Smart was the vocalist and Mr. F. W. Beard the accompanist. The principal features of the programme were Rubinstein's Sonata in A minor for violin and pianoforte and Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat for pianoforte and strings (Op. 38).

The famous Besses o' the Barn brass band gave two concerts on the 12th ult., completely filling our Town Hall both in the afternoon and evening. The most astonishing feature of the performance was a selection from Wagner's "Walküre," arranged by Mr. Alex. Owen, the conductor of the band.

The West Bromwich Choral Society opened its current series of concerts with a fine all-round performance of Sterndale Bennett's cantata "The May Queen," given in the West Bromwich Town Hall, on the 16th ult., under Mr. William Hartland's conductorship. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. The artistic personnel consisted of Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. Gwillym Richards, and Mr. Daniel Price, vocalists; Mr. William Henley, solo violinist, and Mr. C. W. Perkins, organist.

The musical festival committee have not yet decided whether or not to hold a festival next year, although Colston Hall is to be built forthwith. In the meantime, all the chief musical events are being held in the Victoria Rooms. On October 29 the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir sang part-songs and members of the company contributed songs. Miss Maud Gay, a native of Bristol, gave a pianoforte recital on the 2nd ult. Madame Albani and her company gave a concert on the 10th ult. Fräulein Inga Schumann and Fräulein Hildegard Schumann were associated in a violin and pianoforte recital on the 16th ult. Miss Amy Lavington, a talented and cultured local harpist, her pupils, with Mr. John Thomas, the Queen's harpist, delighted a large assemblage by their performances upon the harp, and Miss Chamerlain and Mr. Arthur Wills by their singing on the 17th ult. The Brodsky Quartet again visited Bristol on the 19th ult., at the instance of Madame Darmaro, who joined them in the interpretation of well chosen chamber compositions.

The Bristol Church Choral Union celebrated its annual festival on October 25, in the Cathedral, when 470 singers took part. They admirably rendered the service, under the direction of Mr. John Barrett, the anthems being Stainer's "I saw the Lord" and Macfarren's "The Lord is my Shepherd."

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A brilliant opening of the Dublin concert season was made with two concerts by the Hallé Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen, on the 15th and 16th ult., in the large hall of the Rotunda. The programmes included familiar works by Mozart, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Schumann, Beethoven, Schubert, and other composers, all admirably rendered under Mr. Cowen's baton. The Overtures to "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhäuser," especially the last-mentioned, compelled the admiration and enthusiasm of the audience. Herr Carl Fuchs' violoncello solos were also greatly admired.

The Royal Dublin Society's chamber music recitals were continued on the 14th ult., in the new Lecture Theatre of the Society, in Kildare Place. The executants for the season are Signor Papini (first violin), Mr. P. Delaney (second violin), Mr. Grisard (viola), Herr Bast (violoncello), and Signor Esposito (pianoforte). The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 12), Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in E minor, and Schubert's Trio in B flat for pianoforte and strings. On the 21st ult. a pianoforte recital was given by Signor Esposito.

The Leinster Choral Society gave a series of three concerts at the Molesworth Hall, on the 16th, 17th, and 18th ult., under the direction of Mr. J. W. Cleary.

The Dublin Musical Society's first concert for the season (Mendelssohn's "St. Paul") was announced to take place at the Royal University Buildings, on the 24th ult., too late for detailed notice.

English opera occupied the new Theatre Royal, Hawkins Street, from the 14th to the 20th ult. Madame Fanny Moody and Mr. Charles Manners have with them a number of well known artists and a capable band and chorus, under the direction of Mr. E. Goosens, Jun.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The season of the popular Saturday evening organ recitals commenced in St. Andrew's Hall on the 5th ult. Dr. Bunnett played Wolstenholme's Sonata in the style of Handel and a Fantasia in C from his own pen, written expressly for the occasion. Light and pleasing in character, it was warmly applauded by the large audience. Miss Stannard, a rising local soprano, and Mr. A. H. Gee, the Australian baritone, but once a resident in Norwich, were responsible for the vocal part of the programme.

A public meeting was held in Ipswich on the 16th ult., under the presidency of the mayor, for the purpose of considering the present position of choral music in the town, and, if possible, to form a thoroughly representative society to embrace both vocal and instrumental departments. After listening to Mr. Bunnell H. Burton, Mr. Lindley Nunn, Mr. J. Hayward, Miss Broome, and others, the meeting decided "that it is desirable to concentrate the forces which have hitherto been divided, by the formation of one central body to be called the Ipswich Choral Society." A small committee was appointed to carry this resolution into effect. There was a unanimity in the meeting which augurs well for the future.

Norwich was favoured with a very unusual entertainment on the 11th ult., for at a concert organised with the idea of reducing a debt existing upon the Roman Catholic schools in Willow Lane, the programme consisted mainly of classical chamber music. Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 44), Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 12), and Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in E minor (Op. 1, No. 3) were the chief features. The executants were Mr. J. T. Gowen (pianoforte), Mr. W. Johnson (first violin), Rev. H. Long (second violin), Mr. E. Weeks (viola), and Rev. Dudley Elwes (violoncello). Mr. Elwes also distinguished himself in Popper's "Widmung," which was played with tender expression and earnestness of purpose; while Mr. Weeks was equally successful in a solo for the viola, an instrument but rarely heard in a solo capacity. Songs were contributed by Miss Louise Burns.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual shower of virtuosic meteors, which the prospectuses prophesy is to be an unusually brilliant one this season, was heralded, in October, by the appearance of M. Pachmann in a Chopin programme. The great pianist was followed later in the same month by Madame Marchesi, who made a very deep impression on an audience which should have been larger. Madame Marchesi was assisted by Herr Kruse. On the 3rd ult. Miss Pancera gave the only pianoforte recital announced as yet this season by Messrs. Methven and Simpson. The most enjoyable number in a well-varied programme was Brassin's transcription of the "Feuerzauber" music. On the 5th ult. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave one of their delightful vocal recitals, in which both artists appeared at their best. Mr. Henschel's interpretation of some Schubert songs was very keenly enjoyed. At the first of the University concerts the Dolmetsch party discoursed French music from the Court of Louis XIV. and XV. on harpsichord, lute, viola d'amore, and viol da gamba, before a delighted audience, in the class-room. The excerpts from Couperin, Rameau, and less known composers were most interesting and instructive. Miss May Gibb contributed the vocal numbers.

Our local sky has also been lit by the less assuming appearances of fixed stars, whose concerts have, to the Edinburgh public, an importance and an interest all their own. Worthy of especial note was the first public appearance here of Mr. Alfred Hollins as a pianist. The gifted musician, whose unutterable misfortune predisposes the musical world to that interest which his talent so worthily satisfies and which his personality amply repays, gave a recital in the Music Hall, on the 14th ult., before a large and most sympathetic audience. Liszt's Polonaise in E, most beautifully played, was perhaps his happiest effort.

Recitals were also given during the month by Dr. and Madame Pudor, Mr. A. B. Bach (who is shortly leaving for Vienna), and Mr. Della Torre.

The Edinburgh Bach Society opened its eleventh session on October 23 by a programme of concertos for two (in C major), three (in C major and D minor), and four pianofortes. The performers were Miss Lichtenstein, Messrs. T. H. Collinson, Dace, Dunn, Francis Gibson, John Hartley, A. Scott Jupp, and W. Townsend. A small orchestra, led by Madame Agnes Hamilton and Mr. Colin McKenzie, supplied the accompaniments, and Mr. Franklin Peterson, founder and president of the Society, conducted. Songs were contributed by Mr. A. B. Bach and Miss Gordon Pillans.

Among the evidences of artistic effort which the announcements of the more important vocal societies afford.

two have evoked an amount of criticism not altogether complimentary. The Choral Union is doubtless hampered by many circumstances easily understood, but it is disappointing to be promised another performance of Berlioz's "Faust" when the premier Society collaborates with the Scottish Orchestra in Messrs. Paterson's scheme. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir has not the same excuse, and there is a widespread feeling of disappointment and disapproval that this splendid body of singers, which its friends say is second to none in the kingdom, should hark back on the third part of Schumann's "Faust" and "The Walpurgis Night" for its appearance in the same scheme. Other works are clamouring to be heard and Edinburgh is clamouring to hear them. If the important novelties of the past few years do not attract the members, do they never dream of a first performance in Edinburgh of Bach's B minor Mass or Beethoven's "Missa Solennis"? The Choral Symphony is not a household word, nor are we intimate with Mozart's Requiem. Are none of Bach's splendid cantatas worthy of notice and are we not to hear the Choral Fantasia again? And what of the works by native composers? If the committee is committed to this dreary round it should give way to another committee with more energy, enterprise, and a realisation of the great responsibilities such a choir must have.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The local musical season has of late been uneventful, if we except the highly successful concert, given on the 15th ult., under the auspices of the Glasgow Society of Musicians. The occasion had been anticipated with singular interest, inasmuch as the concert was in aid of the Society's Benevolent Fund, and St. Andrew's Hall presented an appearance seldom witnessed nowadays when a high-class programme is submitted. The star of the evening, Miss Marie Brema, surpassed herself in her contributions, and a feature of the concert was her touching exposition of "Ein Froehlich's Gesang," a fine example of German seventeenth century song. Dr. A. L. Peace had a hearty reception from his numerous Glasgow friends, and his performance of a Fantaisie and Fugue by E. Bernard showed once more the consummate art of the Liverpool organist. Mr. Maurice Sons gave a finished performance of Bach's Chaconne, Mr. Philip E. Halstead contributed with rare effect a couple of pianoforte solos; chamber music had also an acceptable place in the programme, and Mr. W. T. Hoeck discharged, with his wonted taste, the duties of accompanist. The arduous labours of Mr. H. A. L. Seligmann, the honorary secretary to the concert committee, ought also to be acknowledged.

Herr Willy Benda's Greenock orchestra invaded Glasgow on the 8th ult. It was quite a new experience to welcome a band of over sixty performers (mostly amateurs) from Sugaropolis. The experiment was, however, interesting, as the band includes some highly promising instrumentalists; Mr. Benda has, moreover, been able to inspire his players with his own characteristic spirit and enthusiasm. Miss Jenny Taggart sang her three songs in her usual artistic style. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's programme at the Queen's Rooms, on the 7th ult., was again drawn up on lines worthy of the cultured tastes of those accomplished artists. Mr. Allan MacBeth's students, at the second concert of the session, easily won distinction in a programme which did the management of the Athenæum School of Music infinite credit.

The Cambuslang Choral Society has had a most encouraging start. Mr. Herbert Walton, the organist of Glasgow Cathedral, is the conductor, and the "Creation" has been selected as the subject of study. Haydn's melodious work has also been taken up by the Airdrie Choral Union. The Maryhill Musical Association is rehearsing "The Rose Maiden," the Stirling Choral Society has "Israel in Egypt" in hand, and the Coatbridge Choral Union has decided to give Haydn's "The Seasons" in March next. Down Ayr way the leading local society has favoured Mendelssohn's "Loreley," Zingarelli's "Laudate," and Handel's "Dettingen" Te Deum. At Dunfermline, Mr. McNabb's choir finds renewed pleasure in studying "Elijah." The Paisley Choral Union, in conjunction with the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union, announces four concerts. The choral works include Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Handel's "Samson."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The second concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on October 25, the chief feature of the programme being the contrast afforded by a Haydn Symphony ("La Reine") and Tschaïkowsky's Fantaisie Overture, "Hamlet." On the 8th ult. Verdi's "Stabat Mater" and Te Deum, together with Beethoven's music to the "Ruins of Athens," proved somewhat of a trying ordeal for the resident forces, which are now being carefully held in hand for Handel's "Israel," to be given as the Christmas oratorio on the 20th inst. The fourth concert, with a miscellaneous programme, was fixed for the 22nd ult. Mr. F. H. Cowen happily retains his position as conductor. The Musical Society gave Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on the 15th ult., the result amply justifying the appointment of Mr. F. H. Crossley to the conductorship. This chorus has, in fact, rarely been heard to better advantage. The new choral sections of the Sunday Society came into evidence in the same oratorio on October 30, and proved to be a highly capable body of choristers. Though not a very large chorus—numbering only about 130 members—the policy of putting everyone concerned to serious individual trial, and granting an honorarium to the leading voices, resulted in the enlistment of a choir of exceptional power and intelligence. Mr. Argent conducted, as usual. The above are among the leading choral events of the past few weeks in the city, but of exceptional interest also has been the appearance of the unique "Goossens" Choir, on October 27, when Gevaert's "Exiles of Erin" was given for the first time in England with marked success. At Southport, Mr. Hudson produced Cowen's "Ruth," on the 11th ult., and, a week or so later, in the same place, Mr. Clarke gave Mendelssohn's "Elijah." On the 9th ult. Mr. Crossley directed the first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation" at Warrington. Dr. Reynolds has accepted the conductorship of the Runcorn Society, and has had in rehearsal Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea." At St. Helen's, on the 21st ult., the local choral society gave Dr. Bridge's "Flag of England" and the Finale from Mendelssohn's "Loreley," under Mr. Elliott.

The orchestral side of art has been represented by one of Mr. Rodewald's delightful "Smoking" evenings at the City Hall, on the 12th ult., when Beethoven's No. 8 Symphony in A and Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" Suite were admirably performed by the Liverpool Orchestral Society. The Societa Armonica has again justified its rehabilitation under Mr. Akeroyd, by giving Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat, and a number of other compositions, including a couple of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's delightful Characteristic Waltzes. The students and professoriate of the College of Music have been well to the front, the whole of Beethoven's Sonatas for violin and pianoforte having been given with excellent effect at a series of recitals by Messrs Courvoisier and Welsing. Two performances of a larger order have also taken place, in one of which Haydn's B flat Symphony, No. 12, formed the chief task of the orchestra, and at the other the same forces, combined with the choral class, gave the first part of Haydn's "Creation," together with excerpts from Mozart's "Requiem" and the "Pignus futurae" fugue from Mozart's Litania in B flat.

In regard to chamber music, there has to be chronicled the success of Mr. Theodore Lawson's second concert with Mr. Brodsky's Manchester quartet, and of special local interest was the appearance of Messrs. Ross and Moore at the Concert Room, St. George's Hall, on the 2nd ult., the first-named of the two "ensemble pianists" being a member of a well-known family of musicians resident in this city. Mr. G. Liebling gave a recital at the Philharmonic Hall, on the 12th ult., with an audience of no larger proportions than that which welcomed Rubinstein to the same place a quarter of a century or so ago, and he deserves the success which later on waited upon his great prototype.

Mr. Josef Downes has produced a unique drama at St. George's Hall, in which he takes advantage of his coloured origin to appear as the leading character in "Mutines the Traitor," and has given his hearers some fine music from the pen of Mr. E. Watson, a local writer of very considerable ability. An excellent orchestra and chorus were directed by the composer at a series of performances given from the 14th to the 18th ult.

The Meister String Quartet, which has recently been formed in Liverpool, made its first appearance at a concert at Walton, on Thursday, the 17th ult., when it met with a most hearty reception. Several numbers selected from the works of Mozart, Schumann, Schubert, Barnby, &c., and a humorous piece, entitled "The funeral march of an Elephant," were rendered in a manner which secured for the executants most prolonged rounds of applause.

Mr. Alexander Phipps has been appointed conductor of the Liverpool Post Office Choral Society.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During November the Hallé concerts have been very interesting, Mr. Cowen sparing no trouble in making his closing season testify to his skill as a conductor, and the band responding nobly to his demands upon it. At the third concert Schumann's Symphony in C, Hubert Parry's set of twenty-seven Orchestral Variations, and Tschaïkowsky's Concerto in B flat minor, with Herr Liebling at the pianoforte, went admirably. At the fourth, on the 10th ult., we had the finest performance yet given here of the "Faust" of Berlioz, so full of life and vigour in the first and second acts and so ridiculously feeble in the third. Miss Jaxon was, perhaps, occasionally slightly lacking in force, but absolutely efficient in her more graceful and expressive utterances; while Mr. Lloyd Chandos sang with great acceptance and Mr. Andrew Black was, as usual, delightful.

The programme for the 17th ult. was unusually interesting and attracted a crowded audience. Herr Moszkowski played his Concerto (Op. 59) splendidly, and the work itself is extremely brilliant, affording ample opportunities for the display of the author's facile execution and exquisitely modulated touch. We should be glad to welcome the composer as the conductor of one of his symphonies. Miss Lilian Blauvelt showed some dramatic aptness and a high voice in admirable training, except, perhaps, that purity of tone has been somewhat subordinated to executive agility.

Among the less regular engagements the chamber concerts of Mr. Max Mayer always excite great attention, and the first of this season was specially interesting. For the second time Mr. Mayer afforded us an opportunity to listen to the refined and classical violin playing of Madame Soldat, who, with Mr. Fuchs and the concert-giver, interpreted Brahms's C minor Trio (Op. 101) and other important works.

The visit of Madame Marchesi, on the 18th ult., was welcomed by a larger audience than, probably, ever greeted a first appearance here of even such a consummate artist as she is. Her charm consists not in mere supremacy of voice, although in slow pathetic songs she sometimes produces some very rich and resonant low notes; but in the perfection of her vocalisation, and yet more in the diversities of style, and even of tone, wherewith she interprets music of the most varied character; being, apparently, equally at home in all schools—in the rendering of Handel's "Ombra mai fù," of Liszt's "Die Lorelei," of Taubert's "Sum, Sum," and of Schubert's "Erl-König." Her acquaintance with English song should, however, have led her into richer fields than those from which she picked the too feeble, and certainly not representative specimens which she selected. The violinist, Herr Johann Kruse, played with great acceptance, with rich tone, and with admirable skill; and the qualifications of Mr. H. Bird (whose name should have been mentioned in the programme) as a perfect accompanist are well and widely known.

For the Saturday evening we had not only the organ recital, at the Town Hall, of Mr. Pyne, but the able performance of "Elijah" by the Philharmonic Choir, under Mr. G. W. Lane, with Madame Ella Russell, Madame Ravogli, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Santley; the Free Trade Hall being densely crowded.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The most important musical event which has taken place in these counties during the past month was the first public performance of Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's new cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," which was given by the Sunderland Philharmonic Society in the Victoria Hall, Sunderland, on the 16th ult., under the personal direction of the composer. A notice of the production appears elsewhere in these columns, and it is sufficient to say here that it is long since the performance of a musical work in this locality created so much enthusiasm as did this production of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's very clever and tuneful cantata.

At the same concert Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was performed, with Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Florence Barnby, and Mr. Lloyd Chandos as soloists. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon Mr. N. Kilburn, the conductor of the Society, for the zeal and enterprise he has shown in connection with this concert, and the high state of efficiency to which his untiring labours have brought the choir which he so ably conducts.

An interesting meeting in connection with the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held in the Town Hall, Sunderland, under the presidency of the Mayor of that town, on the 12th ult., when Mr. Samuel Reay, of Newark, read a paper on "Musical Reminiscences."

Messrs. S. and A. Oppenheim gave a very successful pianoforte and violin recital in the New Assembly Rooms, Newcastle, on the 12th ult. They were ably assisted by Miss Gertie Smith (violoncello) and Madame Pudor van Rhyn (vocalist).

A choral society has just been formed at Willington under the conductorship of Mr. Lonsdale. Haydn's "Creation" has been put into rehearsal and will probably be given early in the new year.

On the 16th ult. Miss Hildegard Werner, assisted by her Ladies' Mignon String Orchestra, and others, gave a concert in St. George's Hall, Jesmond, before a crowded audience. The programme included several selections, well played by the orchestra, under Miss Hildegard Werner's leadership. The solo violinist, Miss Lily Cooke, was heard to advantage in a Violin Concerto and "Brindisi," by Alard. Miss Gidney played with ability Chopin's Polonaise in A and some of Brahms's Hungarian Dances. Not the least enjoyable feature in the programme was a Japanese song and dance, given in costume, by Miss Hope Goddard, a tiny little girl six years old, who was twice recalled for her clever performance.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

The old organ in St. Andrew's Church (a fine specimen of John Snetzler's work, originally built for St. Mary's in 1776) has been thoroughly rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. P. Conacher and Co., who have successfully preserved Snetzler's flue work while adding some admirable specimens of modern voicing in solo stops. The keyboards and all the mechanism are new. Mr. W. S. Hoyte gave a recital on the restored instrument on the 3rd ult., when the church was crowded. A noteworthy example of Mr. Hoyte's artistic skill was the carefully worked up crescendo throughout the short episode between the Adagio and final Fugue in Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major.

The first concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society took place on the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood. Mr. Wood's success with the Society is bearing good fruit in increased attendance and interest in the concerts. Acting upon his suggestion the committee selected Gounod's opera "Irene" for this concert, a work that, in its entirety, is comparatively unknown. The solos were entrusted to Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Dina Saul, Miss Southerland, Messrs. Philip Brozel, Watkin Mills, Gwillym Richards, Mervyn Dene, and Felix Barry, who did complete justice to the work. The band and chorus have profited greatly by Mr. Wood's thorough methods; but we must not forget to give a share of praise to Mr. Branscombe, of Liverpool, who undertook the earlier choral rehearsals in the absence of Mr. Wood.

The new City Orchestra has commenced its rehearsals under Mr. Wood, who has personally tested and selected the members. May we hope that at last high-class orchestral music may cease to be an exotic in Nottingham?

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The amalgamated concerts of the Leeds Subscription and Philharmonic Society, which supply most of the good music we hear in Leeds, promise an exceptionally interesting and successful season. The series opened, on the 2nd ult., with a large audience and an excellent programme, chiefly of orchestral music, supplied by the Hallé band. Mr. Cowen gave a highly finished reading of the "Eroica" Symphony, while among the less familiar things were Goldmark's elaborate "Sakuntala" Overture and Tschaïkowsky's "Mozartiana" Suite. The Philharmonic chorus gave a fairly successful performance of Dr. Stanford's "Phaudrig Croohore," though it is a work that demands still greater finish in points of detail.

On the 23rd ult. the Leeds Choral Union gave a concert performance of the "Flying Dutchman." Miss Palliser and Mr. Andrew Black sustained the chief parts, the minor ones being creditably taken by Miss Margaret Vereker, Mr. T. Child, and Mr. W. Thornton. Mr. Benton conducted a generally efficient performance.

At Bradford, on October 25, the Old Choral Society fell back on "Elijah," to the satisfaction of its hearers and the advantage of its funds. The chorus-singing was marked by its habitual freshness and energy, and the soloists, though all local, proved highly efficient. Mr. Uttley, who has recently been studying under Mr. Santley, took the part of Elijah with considerable success, and Miss Symons, Miss Thornton, and Mr. Brearley were the representatives of the other principal parts. Mr. Hartwell Robertshaw conducted. On October 28 the first of the Subscription Concerts took place. A masterly interpretation, by Madame Soldat, of Brahms's Violin Concerto was the distinguishing feature of the programme, which also included Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, and, as a highly interesting novelty, the Overture to Wagner's very early opera "Die Feen," which has much more intrinsic merit than one might expect. Miss Macintyre, the vocalist, was not entirely successful in her solos, but Mr. Cowen was at his best as the conductor of the concert. The second Subscription Concert, on the 8th ult., was miscellaneous, and of but ephemeral interest.

The Bradford Permanent Orchestra gave one of its concerts on the 5th ult. Here also was provided as the chief attraction a modern Violin Concerto, that of Dvorák, which was very artistically played by Mr. H. Verbrugghen, a most finished and satisfying player. In this and in Sullivan's delightful Overture "Di Ballo" the band was heard at its very best, the performances doing credit to its clever conductor, Mr. Bartle. Mr. W. Haigh's excellent viola playing and Miss Agnes Nicholl's songs were among the other features of the concert deserving notice. On the 7th ult. Madame Blanche Marchesi gave a vocal recital, but unhappily there was but a miserable audience to enjoy her consummately artistic performances and those of the violinist, Mr. Kruse, and the admirable accompanist, Mr. Henry Bird. A modest but highly interesting concert was given by Miss Lummert on the 21st ult., when she sang a well chosen series of Lieder, and was well supported by Mr. Briggs as violinist and Miss Eisele as pianist.

The musical doings at Halifax have been of considerably more importance. On the 3rd ult. an amateur association, rejoicing in the rather cumbrous title "The Northgate End Orchestral Society," gave a creditable performance of Mendelssohn's early Symphony in C minor. It attempted a higher flight in the "Meistersinger" Overture, and accomplished its task by the simple expedient of taking it at something like three-quarters the correct speed. Dr. Pudor's fine violoncello playing and Madame Pudor's artistic singing greatly added to the interest of the concert, which was conducted by Mr. Priestley. On the 11th ult. the Halifax Choral Society began its season with a varied but excellent miscellaneous programme, in which Mr. Cowen and his band took a leading part. Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Bach's "O Light everlasting," and a portion of the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" were the principal features. The chief vocalist was Madame Duma, and the singing of the "Spinning Song" by the ladies of the chorus deserves a special word of praise.

To the Hull Vocal Society belongs the credit of introducing Mr. Elgar's masterly cantata "King Olaf" to the district. There is no need to expatiate on the merits of this romantic and powerful work, so rich in ideas and so glowing with colour. It was conducted by Dr. G. H. Smith, and the performance is said to have been one of the best the Society has ever given. The principals were Madame Bertha Moore, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Charles Copland. On the 18th ult. the Hull Harmonic Society followed its own excellent precedent of a year ago and invited Dr. Stanford to conduct his "Voyage of Maeldune," a beautiful work that has been most unduly neglected since its production at the Leeds Festival of 1886. The principals were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Muriel Foster, Messrs. Hirwen Jones and Dan Price; and with such an able quartet of soloists, and a band strengthened for the occasion, the performance was more than adequate. In the miscellaneous part of the programme Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture and Dr. Stanford's own "Shamus O'Brien" Overture were included.

The conductorship of the Dewsbury Choral Society has been given up by Mr. G. H. Hirst, and has devolved upon another able and enthusiastic amateur, Mr. T. L. Chadwick. "St. Paul" was the oratorio chosen for the concert on the 15th ult., and was very creditably given, the chorus-singing being excellent, while the principals, Miss Ruby Shaw, Miss Vereker, Mr. Brearley, and Mr. Francis Harford, were all earnest, unaffected, and artistic. On the 9th ult. the first of a series of classical concerts was given at Pudsey by Mr. L. Gaunt, the programme including Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet. On October 31 an interesting chamber concert took place at Scarborough, pianoforte trios by Beethoven and Raff (G major, Op. 112) being included in the programme, and played by Mr. W. H. Cass, Miss Alderson Smith, and Mr. Owen Williams. Mr. Bantock Pierpoint was the vocalist.

The receipts of the Leeds Musical Festival of 1898 reached the record total of £11,490, an advance of more than £500 upon those of 1895. The expenditure, however, has increased by £422—the total this year being £9,352, against £8,930 three years ago. The net credit balance this year is £2,138, compared with £2,039 in 1895. The committee have distributed £2,000 amongst six of the Leeds medical charities, adding the balance of £138 to the reserve fund, which has now reached the very substantial sum of £4,273. The Provisional Committee have been empowered to grant out of the interest from the reserve fund a sum not exceeding £50 per annum towards the formation of a permanent orchestra in Leeds, if and when such an organisation is formed. This is a step in the right direction and a gratifying sequel to the recent festival.

Some features of special interest have been presented during the past few weeks at the Champs-Elysées concerts, which, owing to the continued indisposition of M. Lamoureux, were conducted by M. Chevillard. One of these was the performance, at the concert of October 23, of "Penthésilée, reine des Amazones," a poem by M. Catulle Mendès, set to music by M. Bruneau, a finely conceived and ably elaborated composition, modern in style, highly dramatic and entirely successful also from the declamatory point of view. It met with an admirable interpretation on the part of Mdlle. Pacary, a genuine artist with a most sympathetic and well trained voice of a delicate timbre. The lady, who, on the same occasion, also took part in the duet from "Götterdämmerung" with very considerable success, is evidently becoming a prime favourite with concert-goers. Another interesting event was the performance, for the first time here, at the concert of the 13th ult., of the entire first act of "Tristan und Isolde," with Madame Litvinne and M. Cossira in the titular parts, Madame Marty singing that of Brangäne and MM. Bartet and Lubert those of Kurwenal and the Seaman respectively.

M. Colonne having so far continued his summary, as it were, of successful works produced by him in former seasons, the task of the critic is consequently rendered an easy one. At the concert of October 30 M. Pugno gave an excellent rendering of M. Dubois' second Pianoforte Concerto and Señor Sarasate played with equal success the Caprice for violin by Guiraud. MM. Pugno and Wurmser also introduced to the audience the new double pianoforte, invented by M. Lyon (two keyboards with two distinct mechanisms, but sharing the same sounding-board and case), with satisfactory results. The concert of the 6th ult. was devoted to compositions by M. Massenet, who conducted. Here again Mdlle. Pacary came in for a considerable share of the applause bestowed by the audience, the gifted vocalist taking the leading part in the "Extase de la Vièrge" and other vocal numbers, while M. Thibaut, the solo violinist of the Colonne orchestra, was deservedly much appreciated in his rendering of the "Meditation" from "Thaïs." The entire programme was repeated at the concert of the 13th ult.

The performances at reduced prices given by the Opéra Comique during the past month, and in which the entire troupe took part, have been a decided success. Although only works on the old répértoire have been produced, there have been some interesting débuts on the part of some of the leading artists; such as Madame Thierry and M. Delevoye in "Mireille," Mdlle. Telma in "Mignon," and the particularly successful one of Mdlle. Brejean Gravière in "Le Barbier de Seville." We have already mentioned the operas announced to be performed in connection with the inauguration of the new theatre of the Opéra Comique, which is to take place in the first week of the present month. M. Gevaert, the director of the Brussels Conservatoire, has been here for some time to assist in the rehearsing of "Fidelio," for which he has supplied recitatives (in place of the spoken dialogue), and the principal rôles in which have been entrusted to Madame Caron and M. Vergnet.

"Dejanire," the late Louis Gallet's drama, with M. Saint-Saëns's music, recently brought out with so much éclat at Bezieres, was produced at the Odéon, on the 11th ult., with the co-operation of Mdlle. Pacary and M. Cogny.

THE NEW YORK FREE MUSICAL LECTURES.

In January, 1888, the New York State Legislature passed an Act authorising the New York Board of Education to provide for a course of free lectures to working men and women, and appropriating 15,000 dollars for the purpose.

From this small beginning has grown an educational movement of great importance to the well-being of New York City. Three years ago music was added to the list of subjects, and Mr. Thomas Whitney Surette was asked to undertake the work in New York City. The lectures were on the following subjects: (1) Ballads, madrigals, and masses; (2) Bach and Handel; (3) Haydn; (4) Mozart; (5 and 6) Beethoven; all with musical illustrations; and at the end of each lecture views were shown of the composers and places connected with their lives. Mr. Surette found these working people quite capable of following and understanding what he had to say, and much more keen about the subject-matter than a more cultured audience might have been. The plan of the lecture on Beethoven, for example, was somewhat as follows: After giving a short resumé of the Mozart lecture, particularly to show how his music reflects the elegance of manner and the somewhat conventional style of life which existed under the old régime, pointing out the perfectly well rounded periods of his melodies, the use of the Alberti bass, &c., the lecturer described the changes in politics and thought which were so pronounced at the beginning of this century; changes which were ringing out the old and ringing in the new, and which found voice all over Europe in the cry for personal freedom and the value of the individual man. Then, having given the audience some idea of the causes which operated to produce Beethoven's music, he began an analysis of a sonata, taking, perhaps, ten or fifteen minutes in explaining its construction and familiarising them with its themes. The audience had in their hands a diagram of the Sonata Form printed in the syllabus from the sonata described in the lecture. This they occasionally referred to as the lecturer spoke. After the analysis the sonata was played through, and there was no doubt as to the enjoyment of the music on the part of the audience.

Now here were 2,000 working people listening to high-class music. Possibly they were for once, and perhaps for the first time, brought into contact with the great Beethoven, and they must have been elevated by the experience.

Lists of books bearing on the subject are printed in the syllabus, and the librarians report that there is a considerable demand for them from members of the audience. Many people come up to express their appreciation of the lecture and the music, and there could be no question as to their sincerity and gratitude.

This year a new departure has been made. Free singing classes have been inaugurated by the Board of Education, and, under the wise leadership of Mr. Alfred Hallam, 600 poor people are learning sight-singing in the hall of the Educational Alliance near the Bowery. The field is almost unlimited and the rewards inestimable.

The South London Choral Association deserves the highest credit for its performance, on the 23rd ult., of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," a work containing some of the composer's choicest music and withal only too rarely performed by our choral societies. This neglect of a classic may arise from the complexity of the orchestral accompaniments, which are somewhat beyond the capacities of the amateur element in orchestras, upon which a large number of societies have partly to depend. Moreover, the cantata necessitates the engagement of five competent soloists. Although it cannot be said that the music appeals to popular taste, the experience of the performance under notice proves that a miscellaneous audience can at times be greatly stirred and constantly interested by the many conspicuous beauties in the cantata. The choral numbers, admirably prepared as they were on the present occasion, were often deeply impressive. They give ample scope for a well drilled choir. Miss Monteith was to have been the principal soprano, but a sudden indisposition on the morning of the performance necessitated a difficult and anxious search for a substitute, with the result that Miss Ada Loaring undertook to read the part, although she had not previously studied it. Under these circumstances the music suffered, but great credit is due to Miss Loaring for her courage and ability. The other soloists were Miss Clara Tudge, a careful and conscientious young singer, Madame Eliza Thomas, Mr. Charles Ellison, who contrived to put much dramatic fervour into his part, and Mr. Robert Grier. Mr. L. C. Venables conducted his forces with quiet skill. The orchestra, excellently led by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, was sometimes overweighted in the accompaniments, especially in the strings.

At a general meeting of the Worcestershire Musical Union, held at Worcester, on the 2nd ult., the Dean of Worcester was elected President, the Bishop of Worcester and others, Vice-Presidents, and the Rev. E. Vine Hall, conductor. Mr. Hall, in returning thanks, reminded those present that this was the twentieth time that he had been elected conductor, and said that for nineteen years it had been his great pleasure to conduct the Society, and that he had presided at no less than thirty-seven concerts. He also observed that the Worcestershire Musical Union was the first Society to give afternoon concerts in Worcester and to get together a really good orchestra for the purpose of performing great choral and orchestral works. Over the programmes of many societies, he said, the words "Made in Germany" or "No English need apply" might be written; but on looking over some of the old programmes he found that the Society had given a hearing to no less than forty English composers. In those programmes we found the names of Morley, Gibbons, and Wilbye; of Purcell, Bishop, and Attwood; of Sterndale Bennett, Pearsall, Wesley, Parry, and Sullivan; while the names of nine Worcestershire composers appeared, including Sir F. Ouseley, A. J. Caldicott, Dr. Wareing, Edward Elgar, Walter Whinfield, and others; thus proving that the Worcestershire Musical Union had not turned its back on English composers.

The annual concert in aid of the funds of that admirable institution the Royal Society of Musicians, held at Queen's Hall on the 11th ult., was of a miscellaneous description. It included songs excellently rendered by Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Clara Samuell, Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint (in lieu of Mr. Arthur Oswald, indisposed), as well as violin solos by M. Emile Sauret and a performance of Moszkowski's "Caprice Espagnol" by the promising young pianist, Miss Madeline Payne. But the most striking feature was the finished singing of the members of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society, who, with their conductor, Mr. George Riseley, came to London expressly to take part in this concert. Such even and full tone, boldness of attack, and perfect pianissimo as were manifested in J. J. Viotta's glee "The dying child," Mr. W. H. Cummings's "Oh! the summer night" (conducted by himself), W. A. C. Cruickshank's "Stars of the summer night," C. Lee Williams's "Lost Time," and other pieces are very rarely heard. Messrs. Henry Bird and Norman Cummings were the accompanists.

Mr. Emile Sauret's Elegy and Rondo for violin and orchestra, which the composer played at the concert of the Society of British Musicians, on the 11th ult., was, a few days previously, heard twice at Düsseldorf, at two of the weekly Symphony concerts of the municipal orchestra, the soloists on both occasions being Herr "Concertmeister" Reibold. The work did not fail to make its customary effect, to judge from the Düsseldorf General Anzeiger, which wrote: "It is, as regards difficulty, a virtuoso piece of the first rank. The first part, Elegy, suffers from a superabundance of interrupted cadences, and a certain formlessness. But the solo instrument is shown to the greatest advantage, and the orchestration is remarkable for great euphony. The Rondo is fresh and distinguished by a great and effective cadenza. The composer, who may be called a violinist of the first rank, seems to have taken Saint-Saëns for a model. Herr Reibold played the piece with brilliant technique and a full and beautiful tone. He would undoubtedly have gained the approval of the composer had he been present. Repeated calls were his reward."

The programme of the last Richter concert, on October 29, was so hackneyed, and the performances of the orchestral pieces so exactly like what we have heard and admired scores of times, that a bare record must suffice. We heard Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and a number of Wagner pieces for the xth time under Dr. Richter, and have really nothing to say that we have not said before. He is Richter, voilà tout! Mr. Philip Brozel attempted the Trial Songs from "Die Meistersinger," and, with Madame Medora Henson, the great Love Duet from "Die Walküre." Both performances were disappointing, for both artists sang with a lack of dignity and style that suggested their looking at Wagner's music through ballad singers' spectacles. We were much distressed at finding the Bayreuth master's music so dull on this occasion. When will somebody start teaching the true Wagner style of musical declamation, Wagner's largeness of utterance and grandeur of expression in English? Or is Wagner impossible in English after all?

An overwhelming audience attended the performance of "Elijah," given on October 29, at the Queen's Hall, People's Palace, by the flourishing Choral Society under the direction of Mr. C. H. Allen Gill. The dramatic sections of the work were followed with intense interest, and the performance throughout gave great satisfaction. The chief principals were Miss Lilian Lea-Bowles, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Whitworth Mitton, and Mr. R. E. Miles. Mr. George Wilby was the leader of the band. The People's Palace, with which is now combined the well-known Bow and Bromley Institute, now enjoys the services of two separate choral and orchestral societies, the older one at Bow under Dr. McNaught and the newer body at the People's Palace under Mr. Gill. Both societies are hard at work preparing oratorios and other important works. It is a gratifying fact that such music attracts the largest audiences in the sometimes despised, and very much misunderstood East-End of London.

The Kruse Quartet party—consisting of Messrs. Johann Kruse, Charles Schilsky, Emile Férir, and Herbert Walenn, with Madame Fischer-Sobell as pianist—gave its first concert on the 12th ult., at the Hampstead Conservatoire. A special feature was the arrangement of the platform for the players in the centre of the hall, the audience being seated round, thus reviving the custom introduced by the late John Ella at the Musical Union concerts. The string quartets chosen for this occasion were Rubinstein's in F (Op. 17, No. 3) and Beethoven's in E minor (Op. 59, No. 2), throughout which the skilled interpreters had no difficulty in holding attention. These compositions were separated by Brahms's Sonata in D minor (Op. 108) for pianoforte and violin, which obtained full justice from Madame Fischer-Sobell and Herr Kruse.

The second meeting of the Curtius Concert Club at the Princes' Galleries, on the 2nd ult., was marked by the introduction to England by Messrs. Richard Gompertz, Haydn Inwards, Emil Kreuz, and Charles Ould of August Klughardt's String Quartet in D major (Op. 61). As a whole, the work is interesting rather than strong. The material is handled in a manner that repays examination, but there are few indications of the impulse and freshness that more than aught else make such a deep impression upon the listener as to be remembered afterwards. The first movement is attractive and there is no lack of spirit throughout. It could not have been better played than by the artists named. Another novelty was Mr. Kreuz's "Russische Tänze" (Op. 46, No. 2), neatly performed by Mr. Gompertz.

The Mozart Society re-assembled for the season in the Portman Rooms on the 12th ult. The master giving the name to this weekly series was represented by his Quartet in E flat for pianoforte and strings (originally composed for pianoforte and wind instruments), effectively played by Miss C. A. Brousil, Messrs. L. Szczepanowski, E. Van der Straeten, and J. H. Bonawitz. The three latter were also heard in solos, Mr. Bonawitz selecting Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in E (Op. 90), and the vocalists were Miss Margaret Hoare and Mrs. Johnston-Watson.

Royal College of Music.—Preliminary examinations for nine Free Open Scholarships will be held on February 1, 1899, in various local centres throughout the United Kingdom. The Scholarships will be allotted as follows:—Composition 2, singing 2, pianoforte 1, organ 1, violin 1, violoncello 1, horn 1. The Scholarships are open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects within the stated ages. They entitle the holders to free musical education at the College, and are, as a rule, tenable for three years. In some cases grants towards maintenance are added. Further information and official forms of application can be obtained from Mr. Frank Pownall, Registrar, Royal College of Music, Prince Consort Road, South Kensington.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah," on October 26, in the church of St. George the Martyr, Southwark. The soloists were Miss Winifred Marwood, Miss Florence Child, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Robert Greir. On the 2nd ult. "The Messiah" was given in St. John's, Isle of Dogs. Soloists: Miss A. Wilmot-Briggs, Madame Mabel Ward, Mr. Henry Holyoake, and Mr. Arthur Walenn. Dr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ. The choir also gave the "Creation," on the 16th ult., in Christ Church, Endell Street, Long Acre. The soloists were Madame Edwardes, Mr. Vivian Bennetts, and Mr. Arthur Walenn. Mr. E. G. Croager accompanied on the organ.

The British Chamber Music Concerts, organised to bring forward the works of native composers, successfully started upon its fifth season on the 1st ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall. An important novelty was a Trio in C minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Mr. Ernest Walker, a cleverly constructed and telling composition, the leading features of which were effectively developed by Messrs. Ernest Fowles, Jasper Sutcliffe, and Paul Ludwig. The second-named introduced a melodious Légende for violin, by Mr. John Francis Barnett. Sir Hubert Parry's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello received conscientious treatment from Messrs. Fowles and Ludwig, and Mr. Reginald Chalcraft was the vocalist.

The series of concerts in aid of the Leighton House Maintenance Fund began in the studio of the building on the 7th ult., when several distinguished artists joined in an interesting programme of chamber music. Miss Fanny Davies, Miss Marie Motto, and Mr. Paul Ludwig played with their accustomed skill Schubert's Trio in B flat for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello and Mozart's Trio in E major. The accomplished pianist's solo pieces were Schumann's Romance in F sharp and one of Chopin's Etudes. Mr. James McInnes ably acquitted himself in songs by Brahms, Sir Hubert Parry, and Lulli; and the pianoforte accompaniments were effectively played by Miss Susan Lushington.

The first performance of Mr. Edward Elgar's "King Olaf" at the Antipodes we duly noticed in our August issue (p. 542). It is most gratifying to find that the work had the great and very unusual honour of a repetition performance, given on July 19, by the North Suburban Choral Union of Melbourne, under the able direction of its excellent conductor, Mr. E. A. Jaeger, who is much to be congratulated on his enterprise and enthusiasm. The Argus (Melbourne), in recording this second performance, says: "The second hearing of 'King Olaf' fully confirms the opinion expressed in these columns that it is a work of high rank, rich in imagination and appropriate dramatic effect."

Madame Cecilia Staunton, a soprano from New Zealand, made a favourable impression at St. James's Hall, on the 7th ult., by her neat rendering of German, French, and English songs. More than ordinary ability, combined with taste, was manifested in her rendering of Brahms's "An die Nachtigall," Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade," Massenet's "Souvenez-vous Vierge Marie," Paul Vidal's "Printemps Nouveau," and Cecile Hartog's "For ever adieu." To the contrasted spirit of these pieces the vocalist was quite equal. The songs were interspersed with violin and harp solos respectively played by M. Emile Blanchet and Miss Edith Martin.

The six Exhibitions offered for competition by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, in connection with its Examinations for 1898, have been awarded to the following candidates:—Pianoforte: Amy Paffard, Willesden; Isabel Moore, Huddersfield; Mabel Starmer, Anerley. Violin: Florence M. Scott, Croydon Conservatoire. Organ: Edith M. Cooke, Swansea. Singing: Amy A. Joyner, Cudworth, near Barnsley. These Exhibitions entitle the holders to two years' free musical education at the Royal Academy of Music or the Royal College of Music.

The official programme has just been issued at Bayreuth for next year's Festspiele, which will commence on July 22 and terminate on August 20, and will comprise the "Nibelungen" tetralogy, "Die Meistersinger," and "Parsifal." There will be two representations of the tetralogy (July 22-25 and August 14-17), five of "Die Meistersinger" (July 28; August 1, 4, 12, and 19), and seven of "Parsifal" (July 29 and 31; August 5, 7, 8, 11, and 20). In retaining seats, which may now be booked, it will be necessary, however, to subscribe for a complete cycle of "Der Ring des Nibelungen."

The first Eisteddfod Caerludd is announced to be held at Queen's Hall on February 22 and 23, 1899. In the music section prizes amounting in the aggregate to about £120 will be offered, the various entries being classed under choral and solo vocal music and instrumental music (pianoforte and violin). The adjudicators for the musical competitions are Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. D. Emlyn Evans, Mr. H. R. Eyers, Mr. W. Frye Parker, and Miss Llewela Davies. Full particulars of the Eisteddfod may be obtained from the hon. secretary, Mr. Maengwyn-Davies, 54, Claverton Street.

On Monday, the 12th inst., Dr. Yorke Trotter will, at St. George's Hall, conduct a series of performances of Gluck's opera "Orpheus," to be given by the students of the operatic class of the London Organ School, who rendered it with so much success last July. The opera will be preceded by a new musical piece, entitled "Pandora," composed by Mrs. Lynedoch Moncrieff (libretto by Risden Home).

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend," at Emmanuel Church Hall, on the 15th ult., under the able direction of Mr. J. W. Lewis. The principal vocalists were Miss Estelle Linden (soprano), Mr. William Fell (tenor), and Mr. Edgar Archer (bass), who specially distinguished himself.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society announced the first performance in the metropolis of Mr. Elgar's Leeds cantata "Caractacus," for the 29th ult., with Madame Medora Henson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Andrew Black in their original parts. Cowen's "Ode to the Passions" will be given by this Society in January.

H.R.H. Princess Henry of Battenberg has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of Miss Louisa Gibson's "First Book on the Theory of Music" for her daughter, Princess Ena. A copy of the same work has also been graciously accepted by H.R.H. the Duchess of Fife for the use of the Lady Alexandra Duff.

Mr. Elgar's "King Olaf" was performed by the Cheltenham New Philharmonic Society, on the 22nd ult., under the direction of Mr. C. J. Phillips. We regret that, owing to the sudden illness of "Our own Correspondent," we are unable to give a notice of the performance this month, but we hope to do so in our next issue.

At St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, the greater part of Act 1 of Wagner's "Parsifal" was announced to be given on the evening of the 30th ult., with Mr. E. H. Lemare at the organ, and the choir of St. Margaret's also taking part. The Amfortas music was, as heretofore, to be sung by Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies.

Mr. Edward Elgar's "Banner of St. George" will be given during this month at Worcester, Richmond, and Bath; and Mr. Franco Leoni's cantata "The Gate of Life" at Shoreditch, Upper Clapton, Batley, and Newcastle.

Messrs. Rudall, Carte and Co. have just issued their useful professional pocket book and engagement diary for the coming year. It is hardly necessary to point out the value of this book to professional teachers and others.

The Finsbury Choral Association announced a performance of Mr. Cunningham Woods' male-voice cantata "A Greyport Legend" and Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" on the 24th ult., too late for notice in our present issue.

A very successful concert was given recently at Copenhagen by Mr. and Mrs. Albert Mallinson, the programme consisting entirely of songs—twenty in all—from the pen of the former, interpreted by the lady.

Mr. J. P. Attwater has been appointed Musical Director of the South London Musical Club, in the place of Mr. Charles Stevens, who resigns after holding the position for more than twenty years.

Herr Richard Burmeister has been appointed to the directorship of the Scharwenka Conservatory, in New York, lately vacated by the return of Herr Xaver Scharwenka to Berlin.

Mr. E. van der Straeten gave a lecture at the Knighton Public Hall, Leicester, on the 17th ult., entitled "The History of Music."

Mr. A. J. Slocombe and Miss Kate Ould gave a concert of chamber music at Queen's (Small) Hall on the 17th ult., with gratifying success.

Mr. Philip Paque has been appointed Sergeant of Her Majesty's Royal Trumpeters, in succession to Mr. Thomas Harper, deceased.

Numerous concerts and recitals have taken place during the past month of which space does not permit our giving detailed criticism. The following, however, deserve special mention:—

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—Both Herr Richard Strauss and Dr. Hans Richter were in Amsterdam, at different times, last month, in order to conduct one of the concerts of the Concertgebouw. Their reception was most enthusiastic, as was that accorded to the works produced. On the other hand, the two eminent musicians expressed themselves in terms of the highest appreciation as to the merits of the excellent body of instrumentalists who had been for the time committed to their charge. Their admiration moreover took a practical form; Dr. Richter placing his honorarium at the disposal of the pensions fund of the institution, while Herr Strauss, whose symphonic poem "Zarathustra" had been produced for the first time here on this occasion, announced his intention to dedicate his, as yet unfinished, symphonic work "Heldenleben" to the Amsterdam orchestra.

Berlin.—The new opera, "Don Quixote," by Herr Wilhelm Kienzl, the composer of the very successful "Der Evangelimann," was produced for the first time at the Royal Opera, on the 18th ult., and met with a splendid reception from a crowded house.—Herr Richard Strauss, the successor of Herr Weingartner in the conductorship at the Royal Opera, assumed his functions on the 4th ult., with a performance of "Tristan und Isolde," a somewhat severe test, through which, however, the distinguished musician passed triumphantly.—The Meiningen Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Fritz Steinbach, gave a series of concerts here last month with marked success, and the opinion is general as to this admirable body of instrumentalists having, under its present conductor, fully maintained the high reputation obtained for it by the late Hans von Bülow. An interesting concert given on the 4th ult. by the Choral Society of the Lehrerverein, under the direction of Professor Felix Schmidt, included an important new choral work, "Nordlandskampf," by the Swedish composer, Andréas Hallén. It proved to be a highly characteristic and effectively scored composition, and was received with great favour.

Bologna.—The first performance here of "Götterdämmerung" took place on the 4th ult., under the direction of Signor Vitale, and before a numerous and appreciative audience. An excellent interpretress of the rôle of Brünnhilde had been found in the youthful Signora Franceschati-Paganini, who is likely to attain considerable eminence in Wagnerian parts.

Brussels.—Wagner's "Das Rheingold" was produced for the first time at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, on October 31, and has been given a number of times since. The French version of the late M. Ernst has been adopted, and the work, for reasons otherwise than artistic, is divided here into three parts, or acts, Madame Kutscherra being the Fricka, Madame Gotancourt the Freya, M. Imbart de la Tour the Loge, and MM. Seguin, Dufranne, and Cazeneuve the Wotan, Alberich, and Mime respectively.—The Ysaye orchestral concerts have been resumed and are being very numerously attended. The concert of the 13th ult., under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl, included Berlioz' Symphony "Harold en Italie," Weber's "Oberon" Overture, and vocal solos interpreted by Frau Mottl.

Christiania.—"Silvio," a new one-act opera by Gaston Borch, a pupil of M. Massenet, was brought out with success at the Royal Opera, on the 2nd ult.

Cologne.—The first concert of the season of the Gürzenich concerts, under Dr. Wüllner's direction, took place on October 31, and included the first performance in Germany of the four new sacred compositions by Verdi, which produced a very marked impression. At the same concert Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was produced, Dr. Chrysander's version of the work being used for the first time on this occasion.

Dresden.—A new symphonic work by Edgar Tinel, the composer of "Franciscus," was produced, for the first time, last month by the Gewerbehaus orchestra, under Herr Trenkler's direction, and received with great favour. The work, which is in three parts, is entitled "The Feast in the Temple of Jupiter," and has for its poetic basis the conflict of Christianity with Paganism, which forms the subject of Corneille's "Polyeucte." In the opinion of competent judges it is an original and characteristic tone picture, brilliant in its instrumentation.—In celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the accession of the present King of Saxony, an interesting concert was given on October 27 by the Mozart Verein, with the co-operation of the Bach Society and other local choirs, under the direction of Court Capellmeister Alois Schmitt. In addition to pieces by Mozart and Handel, the programme included a cantata by Joh. Seb. Bach, "Auf, schmetternde Töne," which had not been performed since the death of the composer. It is scored for four solo voices, chorus, orchestra, and organ, and was written in 1737 in honour of the name-day of the Elector Friedrich August III. Another feature of the concert was the playing of Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto on the part of the veteran Dr. Reinecke, one of the greatest living interpreters of the Salzburg master's pianoforte works.

Florence.—"The Mikado" is announced to be shortly brought out at the Pergola Theatre. This will be the first production of the Gilbert-Sullivan opera in Italy.

Frankfort-on-Main.—Eugene d'Albert's new one-act comic opera, "Die Abreise," met with a very good reception on its first production, on October 28, at the Stadt-Theater. The composer, who has made up for want of dramatic interest in the piece by some light and graceful music, was repeatedly recalled at the conclusion of the performance, which, under the direction of Dr. Rottenberg, was an excellent one.

Hanover.—The first performance took place at the Royal Theatre, on October 30, of a new opera, "Matteo Falcone," the composer of which, Herr Theodor Gerlach, is also the author of the libretto. The work, while mainly constructed upon Wagnerian lines, does not discard altogether some of the set forms of the older opera, and it proved highly effective in its numerous dramatic situations, as well as in its masterly orchestration.

Digitized by Google

Leipzig.—The fourth Gewandhaus concert, under the direction of Herr Arthur Nikisch, last month, included symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven, while Professor Hugo Becker, of Frankfort, gave a superb rendering of Dvorák's violoncello concerto and of a sonata by Giuseppe Valentini, with the pianoforte accompaniment by Signor Piatti. An interesting feature also was the singing by the Thomas-Schule Choir of some sixteenth century madrigals by Johann Stephani and Leo Hasler. The fifth concert of the Gewandhaus was devoted for the greater part to the memory of Mendelssohn (died November 4, 1847), and included the "Hebrides" Overture and numbers from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Mr. Plunket Greene, who appeared here for the first time, was the vocalist, and in "Wotan's Farewell," and songs by Cornelius and others, gained the favour of his audience.

Madrid.—Serrano's new national opera, "Gonzola de Cordoba," achieved a marked success on its first performance, on the 1st ult., at the Royal Theatre.

Mannheim.—A new opera, "Künstlerherzen," by the young composer Richard Baertlich, was brought out at the Court Theatre, on the 3rd ult., and very favourably received. The libretto deals with a romantic episode in the life of Johann Christian Bach, one of the sons of the great Leipzig Cantor.

Messina.—It is not often that a composer cares to make his début in public with so ambitious a work as a symphony, as was done recently by Orlando Salvatore, a member of the Municipal Orchestra, who himself conducted the performance. Orlando is already eleven years of age!

Milan.—Performances at the Teatro Lirico, under the management of Signor Sonzogno, recommenced, on October 22, with a revised version of Signor Cilea's "Arlesiana," previously brought out last season, but found somewhat too lengthy. Reduced from four acts to three, and with other alterations, the work produced a highly favourable impression. A one-act opera, "La Fine de Mozart," by the Maëstro Marco Anzoletti, a professor at the Milan Conservatorio and composer of some important symphonic works, was received with but little favour on its first production on October 25. The first great novelty at this house will be "Fédora," the new opera by Signor Giordano, the composer of "André Chenier," which is being most elaborately mounted, and in which Signora Gemma Bellincioni will interpret the title part.——The Theatre La Scala will open its doors on the 26th inst., with "Die Meistersinger," Signor Arturo Toscanini, the new conductor, having recently spent some time at Munich studying the performances of Wagner's inimitable musical comedy at the Royal Theatre.

Moscow.—A committee has been formed for establishing a musical academy in the little village of Wichwotinzy, in the Department of Yalta, where Anton Rubinstein was born, which is to be named after the great pianist-composer. The foundation-stone is to be laid in the course of the present month.

Munich.—Herr Richard Strauss took his leave of the Munich public, in his capacity as conductor of the Royal Theatre, with an excellent performance, on October 25, of "Fidelio," at the conclusion of which the audience testified both by hearty acclamations and floral offerings to the esteem in which the artist is held in the Bavarian capital. His successor, Herr Stavenhagen, formerly of Weimar, took up his new functions last month.

Prague.—An opera, "Armor," by Silvio Lazzari, about the right of performance of which a fierce dispute had been raging for some time between the Czech and German theatres, has at length been brought out by the latter institution, on the 8th ult., and accorded an enthusiastic reception. Lazzari is a follower of Wagner.

St. Petersburg.—A concert in memory of Tschaïkowsky was given, on the 5th ult., in the Grand Hall of the Conservatoire by the Imperial Musical Society, on which occasion a marble statue of the composer by the sculptor, Beklemischeff, was unveiled in the foyer of the Institution. The programme included the Second Symphony, the Suite for string orchestra, the Slavonic March, and vocal pieces by the deceased master, Herr Leopold Auer being the conductor.

The Hague.—M. Richard Hol, the veteran composer, now in his seventy-fourth year, has resigned the conductorship of the well-known Diligentia concerts, and will be succeeded by M. Mengelberg, the distinguished director of the Concertgebouw Orchestra, of Amsterdam. A project is on foot, moreover, for the formation of a new symphony orchestra, under the direction of M. Henri Viotta, the principal of the Royal Music School and conductor of the very enterprising Amsterdam Wagner Society.

Turin.—The opera "La Creole," by F. Collins, which obtained the first prize at a competition instituted some time since by a Viennese publisher, was brought out with very good success on the 6th ult., at the Theatre Vittorio Emmanuele.

Vienna.—The opening concert of the season of the Philharmonic Society, on the 6th ult., attracted an unusually crowded audience on account of its being the first occasion on which Herr Mahler wielded the baton at this famous Institution. The programme was strictly classical and included the Overture to "Coriolanus" and the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, as well as Mozart's Symphony in G minor. The success was complete and, greatly as the retirement of Dr. Richter from the conductorship is regretted by the Viennese public, there was a prevalent feeling of satisfaction that at least he had been succeeded by a musician of consummate ability.——The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde opened its concert season on the 13th ult., when a new composition by Herr Carl Goldmark, a Psalm for chorus and orchestra, and Verdi's "Four Sacred Pieces" were produced for the first time.——At the Imperial Opera "Tristan und Isolde" was given, on the 5th ult., for the first time without any curtailment whatever, a concession which proved very acceptable to the audience.

Weimar.—Subscriptions amounting to over thirty thousand marks having already been forthcoming for the projected Liszt monument in this town, the committee are about to open the customary prize competition to sculptors for the design.——A performance was given on October 21, at the Stadt-Kirche, of Haydn's "Creation," to celebrate the centenary of the first production of the work. An excellent interpretation was given by the united forces of the Chorverein, Singakademie, and Kirchen Chor, under the direction of Herr Müller-Hartung. The "Creation" was first produced at the Schwartzenberg Palace, Vienna, by a choir of trained amateurs, on April 29, 1798, and was repeated by them on the following day. The first public performance of the work took place in March, 1799, at the National Theatre in the Austrian capital.

OBITUARY.

On October 20 passed away, at the advanced age of seventy-nine, Walter Stewart Broadwood, a well-known musical amateur, who, until of recent years, was a partner in the firm of John Broadwood and Sons, having entered in 1843 and retired in 1890. He was an enthusiastic and very capable performer on the flute. The former connection brought him into friendly relations with the leading musical artists and critics of his day, notably with Joachim, Strauss, Piatti, J. W. and Madame Goddard Davison (he was a devoted admirer of Arabella Goddard's playing), Madame Schumann, Hallé, and Pauer—the last-named he induced to settle in this country. Those who remain of that bright period recall him as a witty and fascinating companion, a sympathetic and appreciative friend. There are some yet left, not named here, whose memories of kindness received are not dimmed by lapse of time. Walter Broadwood was born on May 2, 1819, a few days before Her Majesty the Queen. His father was James Shudi Broadwood; his grandfather, John Broadwood; his great-grandfather, Burkhard Tschudi (Shudi), the harpsichord maker and founder of the Broadwood house. Henry Fowler Broadwood was his elder brother and senior in the business. After completing his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, he went abroad to acquire French and German, in both languages gaining a rare colloquial proficiency, towards which he was assisted by his excellent musical ear. He subsequently added to these languages a knowledge of Italian, Spanish, and Norwegian, and finally Welsh, during a residence of some years in the Principality. While at Cambridge, being fond of athletics, he rowed for some years in the Oxford and Cambridge boat race. As a flute player he studied with the best masters and revelled in concerted music in which his instrument had a part. He was for years in the orchestras of the Amateur Musical Society and the Wandering Minstrels. His friendship for the late Theobald Boehm led to his becoming the champion of that eminent inventor when Boehm's merits and claims were attacked. He revised and published an essay on the construction of flutes, written by Boehm for the late Mr. Rudall in 1847, adding to it correspondence and interesting documents, with a preface and appendix by himself (Rudall, Carte and Co., 1882). In thus taking Boehm's part, he virtually settled the controversy at that time raging respecting the inventions of Boehm and his predecessor, Captain Gordon. An historical souvenir of Walter Broadwood is the circumstance that he did the honours of his father's house in Bryanston Square when Guizot, in 1848, fled from Paris and took shelter there. Charitable, impulsive, with a delightful fund of banter, he was readily at home with foreigners and a favourite in every society. He was buried at Malvern Wells, where his home had been of late years, on October 24.

On the 8th ult., suddenly, at Richmond, Surrey, William Christian Sellé, aged eighty-six. Dr. Sellé, who received his degree from the Archbishop of Canterbury, was for many years organist at the Chapel Royal, Hampton Court Palace.

On October 31, at Clarence House, St. James's, after three days' illness, George Frederick Bambridge, aged fifty-four. Mr. Bambridge was private secretary to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, in whose service he had been for thirty-two years. He was a brother of Mr. W. S. Bambridge, organist and music master of Marlborough College.

We regret to record the death of Robert Handel Booth, the celebrated bass trombone player, which took place at South Reddish, Stockport, on the 3rd ult., at the age of thirty-nine. Thus two of the famous "Trombone Quartet"—namely, Mr. Fred. W. Davis, the first tenor, and Mr. Booth, the bass—have died within seven months of each other. Mr. Booth, who was born at Scarborough in November, 1859, as a lad belonged to the Besses o' the Barn band, which has won so many prizes at band contests in Yorkshire and Lancashire. At the age of nineteen he came to London and joined the Grenadier Guards under Dan Godfrey, but he left the army in 1882 to travel with Mr. Mapleson's opera company. He subsequently played at the Philharmonic and at almost all the principal orchestral concerts.

The death is announced, on October 18, at Dresden, of Professor Franz Magnus Boehme, the well-known authority on subjects appertaining to musical history, and more particularly to folk-song literature, who was in his seventy-second year. Born at Weimar, he commenced life as a village schoolmaster in Thuringia and subsequently became Cantor at Riednordhausen, near Erfurt, before he obtained the means for a three years' course of study at the Leipzig Conservatorium. In 1878 he obtained a professorship of harmony and counterpoint at the newly founded Hoch'sche Conservatorium in Frankfort, which he occupied for some years, and for the remainder of his life resided at Dresden, devoting himself exclusively to musical research. His "Altdeutsches Liederbuch," a monumental repository of authentic German Volkslieder, published in 1877, induced the Prussian government to entrust Boehme with the editing likewise of the unpublished portion of the late Ludwig Erk's laborious work in a similar field of research. Boehme also wrote a valuable "History of Dance Music in Germany," and was engaged upon an elaborate history of musical instruments at the time of his death.

The death is announced, on the 7th ult., at Gross-Tabarz, in Thuringia, of the distinguished Wagnerian tenor, Max Alvary (recte Achenbach), who but a few seasons since delighted London audiences by his interpretations of the parts of Siegmund, and particularly of Siegfried, in the third part of the "Nibelungen" tetralogy. The son of the noted Düsseldorf landscape painter, Andreas Achenbach, he had received an excellent education, and although his parents were originally opposed to his appearing on the stage, they were eventually reconciled to it by the brilliant successes he achieved, both in his native Germany and elsewhere. Like many of the most artistically trained Continental vocalists—such as Messchaert, Van Rooy, Planck, Scheidemantel, and Perron—Alvary was a pupil of Stockhausen.

The once highly popular operatic tenor, Alessandro Bettini, the husband of the late Madame Trebelli, died in his native Italy on the 4th ult., at the mature age of seventy-nine. Miss Antoinette Trebelli, the daughter of Bettini and Zelia Trebelli, is an appreciated concert vocalist in Australia.

M. Pierre van Damme, who for a number of years occupied the chair of ecclesiastical history at the Seminary of Ghent, died in that town on the 3rd ult., at the age of sixty-six. It was also owing to his persevering efforts that the Ecole de Musique religieuse, of Malines, was established, of which the late M. Lemmens was the first principal, and which is at present under the direction of M. E. Tinel.

James Robert Alsop, of Liverpool, died on November 21, aged forty-seven years. Deceased was at one time a prominent baritone vocalist, but had for a considerable period devoted himself to teaching and the management of a local music publishing syndicate. He was also organist of St. Thomas's Church, Stockport.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Bridlington.—The Musical Society, under the energetic and enterprising direction of Mr. Bosville, announces for performance Stanford's new Te Deum, Elgar's "The Black Knight," and Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha"—all three modern works and by native composers. The Society will adopt the normal diapason pitch.

Cheltenham.—A very successful concert was given by the Musical Festival Society, in the Assembly Room, on the 3rd ult. The programme, which was of a miscellaneous character, was admirably sustained by such distinguished artists as Madame Albani, Miss Ada Crossley, and Mr. Ben Davies, vocalists; Miss Fanny Davies and M. Johannes Wolff, instrumentalists. The concert auspiciously opened the twenty-ninth season of the Society so ably directed by Mr. J. A. Matthews.

Calverley.—Haydn's "Creation" and Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" were given by the Choral Society, on the 14th ult., with marked success, more especially in regard to the choral singing. Miss Edith Knott, Mrs. W. Pilley, Mr. Edwin Kellett, and Mr. John Browning, the soloists, were efficient in their respective parts, and Mr. James Hall proved to be an able conductor.

Dudley.—The Vocal Union gave a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" in the Public Hall, on the 2nd ult., with gratifying success. The soloists were Madame Carrie Siviter, Mrs. Arthur Bird, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. William Evans. There was a full band and chorus of 150 performers, who did excellent work under the efficient leadership of Mr. W. H. Aston, who is to be congratulated upon the success of his efforts. Mr. T. M. Abbott was the leader of the band.

Harrogate.—Dr. Armes' oratorio "St. John the Evangelist" was given on the 15th ult., in the Congregational Church. The chorus, which numbered about eighty picked voices, was conducted by the composer. The solos were well rendered by Miss Fanny Sellers, Miss Robinson, Miss Gertrude Batley, Mr. Macdonald, and Mr. John Nutton; while Mr. T. Tertius Noble (organist of York Minster) ably officiated at the organ.

Wellington (New Zealand).—Mr. Maughan Barnett's sixteenth organ recital was given in St. John's Church, on September 22, when the programme included Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata (No. 5), Lemmens' "Storm" Fantasie, and works by Wesley, Lemare, Grison, and Batiste.

He is a new man, but one who will undoubtedly rise very shortly into the highest rank. HEREFORD CHORAL SOCIETY.—BARNETT'S "ANCIENT MARINER."—"Mr. Charles Knowles has a bass voice of which he may well be proud, and the passages allotted to him were faithfully interpreted. He was exceptionally powerful at times, infusing much vigour and effect, and this was especially noticeable in the aria, 'Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship.' He also contributed 'O happy living things' with rare taste and power. . . . Mr. Knowles followed with the song 'Droop not, young lover,' which was also a magnificent effort, and received the encore 'Bid me to live.'"—Hereford Times, Nov. 19, 1898.

"Mr. Charles Knowles, a Yorkshire singer, is well-known to Herefordians as a Festival singer. His fine voice and well-considered dramatic interpretation were greatly enjoyed, and he may rest assured of a hearty welcome whenever he appears on a Hereford platform in future. . . . The aria 'Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship,' was his most appreciated number. . . . The quartet, 'Around, around flew each sweet sound,' was one of the most melodious gems of the whole performance, and was faultlessly sung. . . . Mr. Knowles was encored for Handel's delightful song 'Droop not, young lover,' to which he gave the best possible effect, singing in response to a recall, 'Bid me to live.'"—Hereford Journal, Nov. 19, 1898.

A NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION
CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS
BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists, Member of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, &c.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham, The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO REVISED EDITION.

With this issue of the new edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music it is desired to direct attention to the additional papers which are printed for the first time in this form.

These are, the University of Edinburgh Mus. Bac. Papers, the Literary and Theoretical Papers required of all candidates in practical subjects for the Professional Grade Examinations of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and the Optional Music Paper set for the Diploma Examinations of the College of Preceptors.

These papers will be found most valuable and useful, and for the kind permission to make use of them the author desires to express his most sincere obligations to Sir J. F. Green, Bart., B.A., Professor Niecks, Mus. Doc., Edward J. Chadfield, Esq., and C. K. Hodgson, Esq., B.A.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

SIXTH AND SEVENTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"'Una' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Ninth and Tenth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twentieth to Twenty-fifth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

*ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each 1s. Words only, *7s. 6d.; †5s. per 100. The loan of Orchestral Parts on application to the Composer.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no chant exceeds C natural.* The requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which it is hoped will materially aid an important part of Divine Service.

* One exception to this occurs in No. 2 (No. 23, by Lord Mornington), which is included on account of its great popularity.

FOR ORGAN.

CLEMENS, C. A.
Modern Progressive Pedal Technique
A SERIES OF STUDIES IN ORGAN PEDALLING, FROM ITS ELEMENTARY STAGE TO THE

TWO VOLUMES, EACH 4s. NET.

"No organ teacher ought to delay one instant in giving this most excellent book to his pupils. Book I. consists of exercises for locating the notes, studies for the toes only—for the toe and heel—sectional scale passages—the staccato—the chromatic scale—the shake. Studies for left foot—for right foot—for double pedal—left hand and pedal—both hands and pedal. Book II. has pedal scales arranged as trios (very charmingly done), and special studies in arpeggios, octaves, double pedal, &c. We are delighted to see that the Radiating and Concave Board is given the preference over the R.C.O. Board. Antic practice away from the pedals is wisely explained and insisted upon, and we have never seen better instruction for the use of the glissando than that given on p. 20. We cannot speak too highly of the treatment of the pedal scales in Book II. It is an educational sin to make a pupil practise pedal scales without using manual accompaniments at the same time. Mr. Clemens' book will enable both teachers and pupils to sin no more in this respect. Altogether we cannot but give the whole of this clever work our most earnest commendation."—The Organist and Choirmaster.

All three of these tasteful examples of the old composer, as arranged with so much tact and judgment by Mr. Fuller Maitland, were heard in the concert-room last season, and all commanded in an equal degree the homage of amateurs."—Daily Telegraph.

SOMERVELL, ARTHUR.

Love's Apology .. .. 4s. | Take, O take .. .. .. 4s.

(Sung by Mr. KENNERLEY RUMFORD.)

"Two new songs by Arthur Somervell are among the most beautiful compositions that have lately appeared; the one to Shakespeare's 'Take, O take those lips away,' may claim a place with those few specimens of the wedding of 'perfect music unto noble words' which are rightly called classical, and the other, 'Love's Apology,' is associated with a fine anonymous poem which first appeared in the Book of Ayres by Tobias Hume in 1605. Both songs have a comparatively small compass, of an octave and one note, and should be well within the powers of even moderately accomplished singers who can interpret beautiful music of the highest class."—The Times.
